FROM THE ASSISTANT EDITOR

At the end of 2020, voting for the World Soccer awards was easy. Bayern Munich, spearheaded by the prolific Robert Lewandowski and expertly managed by Hansi Flick, made voting in the men's categories straightforward, as did Lyon and their coach Jean-Luc Vasseur in the women's categories, while Chelsea striker Pernille Harder won the inaugural Women's Player of the Year award.

This year, however, it was a bit more complicated – at least in the men's awards – with the Champions League, Copa America and European Championship all throwing up contenders in the minds of our panel.

Ultimately, voters felt that Lewandowski's extraordinary goalscoring record made him a worthy winner, ahead of double European champion Jorginho, or Lionel Messi, who finally ended his long wait for a major international trophy.

We'll let you discover the rest of the winners yourself by turning to page 49. In addition to the players, managers and teams of the year, we've also picked out the People of the Year for 2021, paying tribute to the individuals that made a mark on the world of football across this year.

Finally, congratulations to another award winner, Jonathan Wilson, who was recently named the Football Supporters Association's Writer of the Year for the third time. The award recognised Jonathan's status as one of European football's most authoritative observers, and we look forward to more of his incisive columns in World Soccer in 2022.

Existential threat...Bury were expelled from the Football League in 2019 and placed into administration in 2020

ENGLAND

Football clubs at "genuine risk" and "need to be protected"

A government-sanctioned, fan-led review of English football has made 47 recommendations to address concerns over governance of the game.

The review, which was chaired by former Sports Minister Tracey Crouch MP, highlighted the European Super League proposal as evidence of the existential threat that many in the game currently face. "While that threat has receded – for now – the dangers facing many clubs across the country are very real," wrote Crouch. "Football clubs are not ordinary businesses. They play a critical social, civic and cultural role in their local communities."

The key recommendations of the now fully-published review include:

- The introduction of a government-licensed Independent Regulator for English Football (IREF) to regulate finances and ownership.
- Establishing new owners' and directors' tests for clubs to ensure that only good custodians and qualified directors can take charge.
- A stamp duty-style tax on every Premier League transfer fee, to be redistributed among the lower leagues.
- Ensuring that supporters are properly consulted by their clubs in taking key decisions, by means of a Shadow Board.

Elsewhere, the review also addressed the issue of Parachute Payments, whereby clubs relegated from the Premier League continue to receive money in order to help deal with the loss of revenue. The English Football League believes that the payments only worsen the disparity between the top flight and the rest of the football pyramid.

Chelsea and Senegal goalkeeper Edouard Mendy responds to media outlets using his picture in stories about Benjamin Mendy, who has been accused and charged with six counts of rape

While the review was warmly welcomed by many, it did have its critics, most notably among Premier League board members. Steve Parish of Crystal Palace described the plans as a "huge act of self-harm". West Ham United vice-chairman Karren Brady wrote in her column in The Sun that Crouch "is confusing competition with fairness", and Aston Villa chief executive Christian Purslow claimed the recommendations would risk "killing the golden goose" of the Premier League. Leeds United's chief executive Angus Kinnear drew plenty of ire for comparing the plans to "Maoist collective agriculturalism".

ITALY

Serie A transfers under investigation

Italian giants Juventus are at the heart of an investigation by Italian authorities into potential financial irregularities regarding transfers. The investigation centres on plusvalenza (capital gains), and of the 62 deals being looked at, 42 involve the Turin club. Transfers involving Napoli, Sampdoria and Parma are also under the spotlight.

ENGLAND

Fans could have caused death at Wembley

A report into the disorder at the Euro 2020 final between England and Italy has concluded that "ticketless, drunken and drugged-up thugs" could have caused death during the chaos at Wembley.

Baroness Casey found that over 2,000 people accessed the stadium illegally due largely to 17 mass breaches of disabled access gates and fire doors, while a further 6,000 people would have stormed the ground if England had won the final. "We are genuinely lucky that there was not much more serious injury or worse," said Casey. "I am clear that the primary responsibility for what went wrong at Wembley that day lies with those who lost control of their own behaviour."

TROMSO IL

Having already taken a leading role in the protests against the Qatar 2022 World Cup, the Norwegian club made another statement highlighting their human rights concerns with their latest kit release. Designed in collaboration with Amnesty International, the new shirt is the first in the world to feature a QR code that, when scanned, will direct users to a website that details the working conditions in Qatar. Malcolm Bidali, a former migrant worker who was arrested in Qatar, helped promote the shirt.

BRENTFORD

The Premier League club have announced that they will be keeping this season's home kit for another year. The practice of releasing new strips every season has been widely criticised, for its impact on both the environment and fans' pockets. "Fans have told us that they would be in favour of the savings," said club CEO Jon Varney. The hope is that Brentford's decision will set a new trend among other clubs.

SERBIA

As if their dramatic late win against Portugal wasn't heroic enough, Serbia's players then donated their entire win bonus to charity. Before the game, Serbian president Aleksandar Vučić promised the players €1m if they secured their place in Qatar but, after Aleksandar Mitrović's 90th-minute winner, the players chose instead to send the money to help treat sick children.

LEAM RICHARDSON

The Wigan manager was widely praised for saving one of his players' lives after performing CPR during training. After striker Charlie Wyke suffered a cardiac arrest, Richardson acted quickly, allowing club doctor Jonathan Tobin (who also helped resuscitate Fabrice Muamba in 2012) to fully resuscitate the 28-year-old. After Euro 2020, charity Resuscitation Council UK urged people to learn how to perform CPR.

FPF

The Portuguese Football Federation came under fire after a league match between Belenenses and Benfica descended into complete farce. Despite a COVID outbreak for the hosts that forced them to field just nine players, including goalkeeper Joao Monteiro in midfield, no FPF decision was forthcoming on a postponement. After Benfica had taken a 7-0 half-time lead, the match was abandoned in the second half as injuries reduced Belenenses to six players.

MARKUS ANFANG

The German resigned from his role as Werder Bremen coach after allegations he used a forged coronavirus vaccination certificate. In an official statement released by the club, Anfang said: "Because of the extreme stress caused to the club, the team, my family and myself, I have decided to immediately step down from my role."

MOHAMED ABOUTRIKA

Kick It Out condemned Qatari broadcasters beIN Sport after pundit Aboutrika embarked on a homophobic tirade about the Premier League's Rainbow Laces campaign, describing homosexuality as "against human nature". beIN insisted in a statement that they "represent, champion and support people, causes and interests of every single background, language and cultural heritage".

LYON FANS

The Ligue 1 club have been forced to install protective nets around the stadium after Marseille's Dimitri Payet was struck on the head by home fans in November, after which the game was abandoned. Lyon installed the netting at the Groupama Stadium "reluctantly" in order to protect players. Payet was also at the centre of a pitch invasion at Nice, and has met with fans of his own club to remind them of the costs of throwing projectiles at players.

Karim ADEYEMI

(Red Bull Salzburg)

For the second year in a row, the January transfer window rolls around with a Red Bull Salzburg player at the top of the shopping lists of Europe's best clubs. In 2021 it was Dominik Szoboszlai, who joined RB Leipzig for €25 million; this time it looks set to be their young forward, Karim Adeyemi.

Unsurprisingly, Salzburg ended 2021 with a comfortable lead at the top of the Austrian Bundesliga, with Adeyemi scoring 11 goals in 16 league games, but more impressively he also had a major impact on the Champions League. The 19-year-old scored three group-stage goals as Salzburg advanced to the knockout stages for the first time in their history, and that hasn't gone unnoticed.

After making his Germany debut in September, a return to his home country seems likely, despite interest from the Premier League and Barcelona.

Felix AFENA-GYAN

(Roma)

The 18-year-old scored a brace on his Serie A debut after coming off the bench late on, and was rewarded with an €800 pair of trainers from Jose Mourinho.

Gianluca SCAMACCA

(Sassuolo)

In Italy, the 22-year-old striker is being discussed as a potential World Cup saviour ahead of the play-offs in March after impressing for Sassuolo.

Jon Dahl TOMASSON

(Malmö)

The former Denmark, Feyenoord, Milan and Newcastle United striker guided Swedish giants Malmö to their second Allsvenskan title in a row – pipping AIK on goal difference.

Patrik SCHICK

(Bayer Leverkusen)

The Czech Republic striker had a hand in five of Leverkusen's goals in their 7-1 demolition of Greuther Furth, assisting one before half-time then scoring four second-half goals.

Ethan MBAPPE

(Paris Saint-Germain)

Kylan's younger brother is only 14, yet he has already been called up for the France Under-16 squad. Ethan is a central midfielder for PSG Under-17s.

Hulk

(Athletico Mineiro)

The 35-year-old ended the Brazilian league season as the top scorer with 19 goals, firing Athletico to the league title alongside strike partner Diego Costa.

AT THE HEART OF THE GAME

Southgate the right man for the England job

However you look at it – tournament success, thrilling nights to remember, bald statistics, personal dignity – Gareth Southgate already stands high as one of the most admirable and accomplished managers in the history of the England national football team. The only thing missing is a trophy.

Yet, as we enter the year of the 2022 World Cup, there are still many critics who prefer to doubt the credentials of Southgate. They say he is too cautious, and that his achievement of reaching the semi-final and final of the last two major tournaments was more about lucky pathways than high-class football.

It seems to me absurd. Do people not remember the sterility of the Fabio Capello team, the waste of the golden generation under Sven-Goran Eriksson, the debacle of losing to Iceland, the failure even to qualify for tournaments under several of his predecessors?

Southgate, who thoroughly deserves his contract extension until December 2024, has helped transform England into genuine trophy contenders; a team that rivals fear, a team with confidence, talent, flair and tactical balance.

It is that final element that is most crucial. The criticism of excessive caution is made because his preferred system has developed into 3–4–3, one that maximises defensive strength ahead of selecting extra players from the myriad of high-class forwards England possess.

There have been two issues: the lack of quality at centre-back and an absence the ball and ability to play box-to-box adds an extra dimension. With Kalvin Phillips and Jordan Henderson excellent options too, England are now blessed in this crucial area of the modern game.

Central defence is another matter. This is the one fundamental weakness, which is surely why Southgate has been opting for 3–4–3 with a couple of flying wing-backs on the flanks. It is a way to play, it can be a way to win tournaments, but it also means the loss of a forward, which is more than a pity when England have so many to choose from. Mason Mount or Phil Foden, but not both? The frustration is obvious.

An unhappy truth, however, is that Harry Maguire and John Stones, the two-man central defensive partnership

Two more years...
Southgate extended his England contract in November the World Cup is time enough for a couple of central defenders of the requisite ability to materialise and give Southgate the option of a back four.

An optimist can see several young men who might: Fikayo Tomori (24), Trevoh Chalobah (22), Joe Gomez (24), and Marc Guehi (21), each of whom won tournaments as players with England junior teams, and who all possess high potential and good technique.

Tomori is the most likely, enjoying a standout season at the heart of Milan's defence as they challenge for the Serie A title. Italian observers are astonished he isn't an England regular already.

Chalobah has won the confidence of Chelsea manager Thomas Tuchel, which is no easy task. The problem for Gomez is overcoming a long-term knee injury, but his talent is plain if he can recover a starting position for Liverpool.

Guehi is the outsider of these four, but maybe the best of them all, thriving in the spotlight at Crystal Palace under the command of Patrick Vieira.

What all these young players should know is that Gareth Southgate will have no hesitation throwing them into the England side if they can convince him they are good enough. In fact, he would do so with the greatest enthusiasm. It could make the difference between England winning the World Cup or not.

Southgate has helped transform England into genuine trophy contenders; a team that rivals fear of top-class holding midfielders. For some years it was the latter problem that most troubled Southgate. He would acknowledge it openly in press briefings, and ponder it endlessly in private with his coaches and advisors.

Time and good fortune appear to have resolved this conundrum, with the maturing excellence of Declan Rice and Jude Bellingham. They are emerging superstars, and Bellingham's style on tried most by Southgate, was not reliable enough for major international matches. He could not afford such a gamble so his choice of 3–4–3 is common sense.

Could it be otherwise? Perhaps so. All international managers are at the mercy of swings of fortune in club football, and what they hope for is high-class players emerging to solve their headaches. It happened with Rice and Bellingham – and the ten months between now and

THE INSIDER

Qatar 2022 poses problems for the calendar

Traditionally, professional football stops around most of the planet while the World Cup is being staged. No one objects, largely because it's generally close season in the northern hemisphere.

Qatar 2022 will be different and difficult because it will not sit in the convenient European summer. The complications are clear from confirmation from the Premier League and the Football League of how next season's schedule will be rearranged to squeeze in the historic first winter finals in the Gulf.

England's clubs provide a larger percentage of players to a World Cup than any other country, so it may be the only nation in which both the top two divisions are halted rather than just the primary competition.

The Premier League season will start on August 6 – one or two weeks earlier than usual – and the final round of pre-finals matches will be staged on Saturday and Sunday, November 12 and 13. The opening match of the finals, with players still potentially nursing their injuries, is on November 21 and the final on Sunday, December 18. The Premier League then resumes eight days later on Boxing Day.

Obviously the more successful a national team is, the less time will be available for their stars to fly back, extra week or more to say hello to their families before kicking off their club duties – a factor that may well have a big influence on which clubs progress to the closing stages of the European club competitions.

One intriguing point is that many foreign players in the top five leagues will have departed the World Cup up to a month before

Qatar 2022... the World Cup's official emblem

The Premier League's final round of matches will be played on May 28 2023, when all games will kick-off simultaneously as usual.

As for the Football League, all its three divisions will begin next season on the weekend of Saturday July 30 with the second-tier Championship stopping for its break on November 13. Competition resumes on December 9 after the World Cup's round of 16.

Leagues One and Two – the third and fourth tier of the English professional game – will carry on as normal throughout the World Cup. That could be good news for club attendances with no competition from the Premier League. However individual matches could be postponed due to international World Cup call-ups.

The final round of the regular EFL campaign is set for the weekend of Saturday, May 6 with the promotion play-off finals on May 27-29.

Incidentally, the fourth round of the League Cup will be scheduled

[A winter World Cup] was eventually approved by FIFA with comparatively little complaint from the major European leagues. Perhaps, at the time, they thought the Qatar World Cup was too far into the distance to be of concern rest and refresh before being thrown back into the holiday hurly-burly.

England is alone, of course, in staging a busy Christmas/New Year holiday schedule. Home-based stars from Spain, Italy, Portugal, France and Germany will have at least an their leagues are due to resume. Inevitably, some major clubs will want to bring one or more matches forward into the gap weeks. FIFA might frown on that but any domestic broadcaster would doubtless be delighted.

for the week between the World Cup final and the Premier League's resumption on Boxing Day. So it may be that any Premier League clubs will have to put out weakened teams but then, they mostly do this anyway at that stage in the competition.

All clear?

When Qatar bid for the World Cup it placed great emphasis on the potential of air-cooled stadia to combat the intense heat of summer temperatures in the Gulf. This writer attended a match in the Al Sadd stadium with the coolers working. A vision was created of vast swathes of land devoted to solar panels to generate the essential energy.

Michel Platini, then-president of UEFA and a former World Cup star, was vociferous in demanding a winter World Cup for the sake of the players. This was eventually approved by FIFA and with comparatively little complaint from the major European leagues. Perhaps, at the time, they thought the Qatar World Cup was too far into the distance to be of concern.

Some long-time critics of the Qatar award and the scandal-scarred selection process probably hoped that the Gulf state would be stripped of the finals for one reason or another and then the summer/winter issue would not arise.

This outcome was never realistic once contracts had been signed. So now Qatar 2022 is looming on football's horizon, bringing the World Cup to the Middle East for the first time.

Top-flight clubs in Europe may worry that fans will lose the habit of attending matches but such concerns have been eased by the eagerness of spectators to return to the stadia after the COVID-19 lockdowns.

Indeed, the sport's ability to shuffle and shift in response to the pandemic suggests that it can and will negotiate the Qatar World Cup disruption far more efficiently than critics fear.

Disquiet has also been voiced about the on-going loyalty of disrupted broadcasters and sponsors. Here, at least, reassurance exists in Qatar's fixture shift being a one-off event. The World Cup finals will be back to June/July in 2026 and the potential European and South American bidders for 2030 will all be sticking to the traditional window. Even a possible Chinese hosting in 2034 would follow suit.

Controversy is nothing new for the Qataris. It has surrounded the tournament ever since the famous (or infamous) votes by the FIFA executive committee in December 2010, which saw Russia awarded 2018, and Qatar beating Australia, Japan, South Korea and the United States to land 2022.

Qatar has ridden fierce international pressure over the treatment and safety standards for the thousands of migrant workers building the gas and oil-rich state. The kafala system of tied contracts was abolished, officially at least, and improved rules and regulations were enacted for stadium construction. These did not apply to workers on supportive infrastructural projects but enough progress was achieved to satisfy international labour organisations.

Human rights, including particularly LGBTQ+ concerns, is another matter. Adelaide United's Josh Cavallo – the only openly gay footballer at a top-flight club in the world – has said he would be "fearful" of playing at the tournament.

Players from Germany, the Netherlands and Norway all staged pre-match T-shirt protests over human rights concerns while stars of several other countries, including England, will discuss whether to follow suit. Amnesty International will ensure the issue plays right up to the opening match, as in Russia in 2018.

Gareth Southgate, diplomatically cautious as ever in straying beyond his managerial comfort zone, says: "I've been in some conversations as part of an FA delegation with people from Qatar, trying to get a better understanding of the situation. We have to be certain on who we should be speaking to and exactly what issues are important."

"We will be representing the country in a foreign land so we have to be 100 per cent sure of our facts. There are clear cultural differences between the nations and we, as a nation, do a lot of business with Qatar. We have to take the time to educate ourselves and if there are areas we can highlight and help, clearly we will do that."

By then Southgate – like Didier Deschamps, Hans Flick, Louis van Gaal and Co. – will have other pressing priorities, while their players' clubs balance any reflected glory against impatience to get back down to business once the circus has left town.

Protests...Germany have been among the teams to object to Qatar's hosting of the tournament.

FIT & PROPER PEOPLE

By Martin Calvano

and James Cope (Pitch Publishing, £12.99)

In 2019, an app called OWAFC hit the market promising football fans the chance to buy and run their own club. Just a few months later it collapsed, leaving customers hundreds of thousands of pounds out of pocket. Fit and Proper People tells the story of the business that was supposed to revolutionise the game, the people who lost out and the consequences suffered by those who tried to hold OWAFC to account.

TAXI FOR KIEV

By Steve Deacono (Pitch Publishing, £16.99)

Taxi for Kiev: Six Strangers, Six Borders, Six Days is the true and uncensored story of six lads from very different backgrounds who had never met before but found kinship in a common goal: to get to Kiev for the 2019 Champions League final between Liverpool and Real Madrid. They embarked on a 3,500-mile taxi trip that took them to many places – physically, mentally and emotionally. It is one man's account of that unforgettable six-day adventure – with shocks, tears and laughs aplenty.

Jonathan WILSON

TECHNICALLY SPEAKING

Lukaku and Chelsea still waiting to click ahead of a key month in the Premier League title race

For Chelsea, and the Premier League title race, January looks a vital month, with games against Liverpool and Manchester City followed by a clash with Antonio Conte's Tottenham. The assumption in the early weeks of the season was that it was Chelsea who would provide the main challenge to the defending champions Manchester City: a Champions League-winning team plus Romelu Lukaku seemed a winning formula. But although Chelsea have started well, it hasn't quite worked out like that.

There was a clear shift as soon as Thomas Tuchel replaced Frank Lampard in January 2021. Chelsea conceded just 13 goals in 19 Premier League games under him last season as opposed to 23 in the first 19. They became much better at combatting opposition set plays and, other than that freakish 5–2 defeat to West Bromwich Albion, had a midfield structure that enabled them to prevent counter-attacks.

And they were flexible: Tuchel is naturally inclined to playing in transition, but he is not such an advocate of the high press as the man he succeeded at both Mainz and Borussia Dortmund, Jürgen Klopp. In the Champions League semi-final against Real Madrid, they were able to sit deep and, at times, play more of a possession-based game.

The only issue was goals: only 23 scored in that final half of the Premier League season. In part step in quality from the Bundesliga to the Premier League – but it was also because of a lack of creativity, in part down to a cautiousness in possession through midfield. The addition of Lukaku seemed an easy solution: he had, after all, scored 24 league goals

Not clicking...
Lukaku's second spell at Stamford Bridge hasn't gone to plan

Aston Villa isn't necessarily replicable across the season as a whole. More troublingly, Chelsea probably looked better in those games in late October and early November in which Lukaku was absent with an ankle injury – albeit against weaker opposition and in spite of the fact they somehow didn't beat Burnley despite a barrage of early pressure. The use of Kai Havertz as a false nine, as he played in the Champions League final, seemed to give them a greater flexibility and fluidity.

It is, of course, still early. Nobody is suggesting that Lukaku is a failure or that his second spell at Chelsea will be a flop. But what is clear is that football is not as simple as taking a

Troublingly, Chelsea probably looked better in those games in late October and early November in which Lukaku was absent with an ankle injury that was down to Timo Werner's astonishing profigacy – his 78 goals across four Bundesliga seasons for RB Leipzig look weirdly anachronistic now, and perhaps hint at a wider sense that there is a significant

And Lukaku began well. But as it turns out, bullying Arsenal and stealing a couple of goals against decent team that sometimes struggles to score and adding a prolific striker.

"If you have a centre-forward like that, you need to use him and I don't think Chelsea have quite figured out how to use him yet," Conte, his manager at Inter, said after Chelsea's narrow 1-0 defeat to Juventus in the Champions League at the end of September. "Last season, they didn't have a proper centre-forward, so they rotated positions, whereas Romelu is a real reference point in attack. He is a very specific striker. Bringing Lukaku into the box, he is dangerous. However, when he starts from midfield, he is incredibly quick. It is very difficult to find a player who is both a target man but can also run from midfield."

Yet Lukaku, as he has shown regularly at international level, is also adept at pulling away from central areas, at not being that reference point. For Belgium, he often pulls out to the right, creating space for Kevin De Bruyne. In theory, with Chelsea usually playing two inside-forwards (and they look better in a 3-4-3 than a 3-5-2 that was tried for a time earlier this season), Lukaku should be able to create space for them, as well as for the wing-backs who provide so much of Chelsea's attacking threat at the moment, while also offering the option to go more direct if need be. And Tuchel is certainly not averse to going direct; his criticism after that Juventus defeat was that his side had played too much like a possession team.

Lukaku should work at Chelsea, but in a world in which so many elite clubs seems obsessed by signing celebrities, by servicing their own content production machines rather than putting together teams that work on the pitch, there is something almost condescending about the fact that even a player as intelligent and versatile as Lukaku, and a manager as clear-sighted as Tuchel take time to get it right. Football should not yield too readily to money, even when it is backed by logic.

1 TACTICAL BOOKING?

Iago Aspas turned 34 at the start of this season, but in Celta Vigo's recent clash with Valencia, it appeared he's still as sharp as ever – in more ways than one. After giving his side the lead with a smart stepover and finish, he appeared to sustain an injury from a clash with a Valencia defender. Knowing that the knock would likely rule him out of action – later tapping his groin area while lying down injured – the striker whipped his shirt off in "celebration", and duly collected his fifth yellow card of the season. He then served his suspension in Celta's next game, while recovering from his injury.

2 EDEN PROJECT

Ambition is always a good thing in football, but the owners of Westerlo in Belgium's second tier may have set their sights a little too high by declaring their interest in Real Madrid's Eden Hazard. "I think I can consider [him] as a friend. I met him when he was at Lille and he promised that one day he would play for Fenerbahce," the club's Turkish vice-president, Hasan Cetinkaya told Voetbalkrant. "Westerlo will be more difficult, but you never know" in this case, perhaps we do know.

3 TOUGH JOURNEY

This season's Coupe de France threw up another remarkable long-haul trip for one of the teams involved. Ten-time champions of Tahiti, AS Venus, are based in French Polynesia in the Pacific Ocean, yet qualified for the French Cup by winning the Tahiti Cup earlier this year. Their reward was a 20,000-mile round trip to southwest France to face fourth-tier side Trefilac FC. Although they suffered a 2-0 defeat, their coach Samuel Garcia took the positives: "The trip has been a very positive experience for the whole team and club," he said. "We showed really good form in this match against a team which plays in a higher division than us." Incidentally, in 2015 Trefilac were on the other side of such a draw, as they endured a 10,500-mile trip to face AS Magenta in New Caledonia.

4 DREADFUL DIVING: PART ONE

It is hardly rare to see footballers exaggerate contact during the heat of battle in the hope of getting your opponent sent off. That was the thinking of Viking goalkeeper Patrik Gunnarsson, after getting involved in a scuffle during the Norwegian top-flight clash with Kristiansund. After being shoved in the chest, Gunnarsson dropped to the ground clutching his face, and the referee duly whipped out a red card for the offender. The problem was, the person who had pushed him was Gunnarsson's own teammate, David Brekalo. Fortunately for the goalkeeper, his team were able to hold onto their 3-2 lead.

5 DREADFUL DIVING: PART TWO

Gunnarsson wasn't the only player to be guilty of some awful playacting recently – the goalkeeper was beaten to the award of worst dive by Palmeiras forward Deyverson. The Brazilian was the hero for his team after scoring the winner in the Copa Libertadores final, but that shouldn't exonerate him from his attempts to get somebody else sent off – in this case, the referee. After feeling a pat on the back, Deyverson dropped to the ground as if he'd been shot, before realising that his assailant was Nestor Pitana, and the weapon was a whistle. Somehow, he escaped the incident without being booked for simulation.

Deyverson... or Diver-son?

Unknown players will decide AFCON 2021

The Gambia's coach believes that lesser known stars could stand out in January's tournament in Cameroon

The big stars of previous AFCONs have not always been the ones that you predict. Everyone in Europe will expect the big names like Riyad Mahrez, Sadio Mane and Mo Salah to be the stars, but that isn't always the case.

Milan's Ismael Bennacer was still playing for Empoli when he was Player of the Tournament in Algeria's 2019 win. When Cameroon won back-to-back AFCONs in 2000 and 2002, their star man Samuel Eto'o won neither the best player nor top scorer awards. Ivory Coast had to wait until 2015 to win, when all-time record scorer Didier Drogba had retired.

Sometimes a new star can emerge alongside one of the big players, and that new star doesn't necessarily have to be young.

Mahrez will be influential for Algeria but it's good to see Islam Slimani starting regularly again too. Slimani is 33 now and was not always in the team when Djamel Belmadi first took charge in 2018, but now he is Algeria's all-time record goalscorer. He should combine well with Baghdad Bounedjah, who is playing for Al Sadd, and is one of my favourite players at the tournament.

Wilfred Ndidi and Kelechi Iheanacho will be expected to do well for Nigeria, but I think that Ahmed Musa – who is 29 and in Turkey now with Fath at Gabon and he could combine well with Denis Bouanga, who is in good form on the wing for Saint-Etienne.

Among the younger generation, Ghana have some very good players. Kamaldeen Sulemana is only 19 years old and playing very well in midfield for Rennes in France. Mohammed Kudus is another midfielder and, like Sulemana, came out of the Right to Dream academy in Ghana and is also doing well for Ajax. I don't think Ghana will win, but these two young players could be stars.

But the big star might not be an outfielder: there are some very strong goalkeepers at this AFCON. Mane will does well and has a good run. Burkina Faso reached the final in 2013 and the semi-finals in 2017, and Lassina Traore could be a real star if they have a good run again. He will turn 21 during the tournament but is already playing at a top level in Europe with Shakhtar Donetsk.

Another player that looks very promising is Ibrahim Kore for Mali. He is only playing for Sarpsborg in Norway, but has scored five goals in five World Cup qualifying games. He could be a real surprise if Mali reach the last eight.

Ben Nabouhane will also be vital for the Comoros as he has experience playing at the top level for Red Star Belgrade, while, at my team, Able Jallow – who plays for Seraring in Belgium on loan from Ligue 1 side Metz – is a very skilful player and an important part of our side.

Everything will be decided for the players on how far their teams go: anyone in a team that gets knocked out before the quarter-finals is unlikely to get noticed.

I think it will be the players who are not so well known in Europe who will decide the latest Africa Cup of Nations.

Karagumruk – is very interesting.

For Tunisia, Wahbi Khazri is an intelligent and brilliant player and he can decide a game by himself.

Sebastian Haller did not fare so well in England with West Ham United but is scoring regularly for Ajax and could do well for Ivory Coast.

Big things will be expected from Arsenal's Pierre-Emerick Aubameyang be expected to shine for Senegal, but Edouard Mendy is in fantastic form for Chelsea. The Moroccan goalkeeper Yassine Bounou (known as Bono), who plays for Sevilla, is very interesting, and Andre Onana is playing well again for Cameroon after a year out for a doping ban.

Outside of the big countries, there could be a breakout star if their team

Eriksen bids to restart career

With his future at Internazionale highly in doubt, Denmark midfielder Christian Eriksen has returned to former club Odense to train.

After suffering a cardiac arrest at Euro 2020, the 29-year-old was fitted with an implantable cardioverter-defibrillator (ICD), which helps monitor and maintain his heart rhythm. Under Italian Football Federation rules, he is unable to play in Italy while wearing the ICD.

Eriksen's contract with the Serie A side is expected to be terminated in January, when he will be free to look for a new club. He spent three years in Odense's academy before joining Ajax, which also remains a potential destination: Daley Blind, the Amsterdam club's Dutch defender, also has an ICD.

OBITUARIES

The gifted, left-footed midfielder scored 72 goals in seven-and-a-half seasons at Liverpool, having made his name at Arsenal. In 1970–71 he hit 26 goals in all comps as the Gunners won the double.

He moved to Anfield in 1974, on the same day that Bill Shankly resigned as manager. "Maybe it will be said that one of the last things I did at this club was to sign a great new player," declared Shankly, and he was proven right: under new boss Bob Paisley, Kennedy won five league titles and three European Cups.

He left Liverpool in 1982, and later played for Swansea City and Hartlepool United, before being diagnosed with Parkinson's disease in 1984.

Phil DWYER (1953–2021)

Cardiff's record appearance maker and their defensive rock of the '70s and '80s.

Frank BURROWS (1944–2021)

Another highly prominent figure in Welsh football, Burrows managed Cardiff twice, with a spell at rivals Swansea in between.

Bertie AULD (1938–2021)

One of the midfielders in Celtic's 1967 European Cup-winning side, Auld also won five league titles and several domestic cups in Scotland, as well as the English League Cup with Birmingham.

Dzyanis KOWBA (1979–2021)

The ex-Belarus international was assistant coach at Vitебsk in the Belarusian Premier League when he passed away aged 42.

Momcilo VUKOTIC (1950–2021)

Partizan Belgrade's second-highest appearance maker, who starred at Euro '76 as Yugoslavia came fourth on home soil. Later embarked on a long coaching career, mainly in Greece and Cyprus.

John SILLETT (1936–2021)

The manager that guided Coventry City to their shock FA Cup victory in 1987.

Fresh Ego Kid... Marvin Morgan

Douglas COWIE (1926–2021)

A Scotland international of 20 caps, Cowie made his name as a defender with Dundee, where he made a club-record 446 appearances.

Horst ECKEL (1932–2021)

The last remaining member of the West Germany team that won the 1954 World Cup, Eckel was credited with dictating the final.

Louis BIMPSON (1929–2021)

Striker Bimpson made 102 appearances for Liverpool between 1953 and 1959, scoring 39 goals for the Reds.

Bernd NICKEL (1949–2021)

Nicknamed "Doktor Hammer", Nickel lies third on both Eintracht Frankfurt's all-time appearance and goal charts.

Marvin MORGAN (1983–2021)

A hugely popular man in English football, having developed a fashion brand that saw him rub shoulders with many of the country's biggest names. The best years of his nomadic career in the lower leagues came at Shrewsbury Town, where he helped them win promotion from League Two in 2012.

Brazilians Palmeiras make it two in a row

Ten months on from their last success, Sao Paulo giants Palmeiras beat Rio rivals Flamengo to the 2021 Copa Libertadores

In many ways, the 2021 final between established powerhouses of the Brazilian game symbolised a new dawn in South American football: here were two emerging super-clubs, with mammoth revenue streams, vast fan bases and astute financial management, contesting the continental crown, further cementing Brazil's domination, playing at the refurbished Estadio Centenario in front of well-heeled fans and a global TV audience.

The Copa Libertadores and its final carry the romance of a spectacle in its purest form. They epitomise the madness and mayhem of the continent's game, one of the last bastions of unchecked football passion, but times are changing. In 2018, the final was shifted to Madrid because every single cliché about Argentinian football turned out to be true – chaos ruled. "We live it as a scam," wrote former Boca Juniors player Diego Latorre.

In 2019, organisers moved the final from Santiago to Lima because of social unrest in Chile. It was the year that CONMEBOL replaced the traditional home-and-away format with a single-leg decider, mimicking the Champions League final in a bid to exploit the match's commercial potential. All the stereotypes of European elite football were present: the match organisation, the fan zones, the security operation, the influx of football tourists and, above all, the monetisation of the entire event.

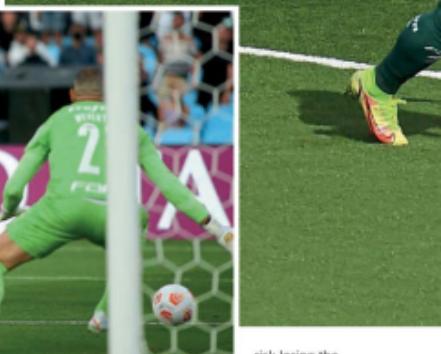

It was no different in Montevideo. Near the Uruguayan capital's lighthouse, a fan zone provided exposure to brands and sponsors. Supporters didn't mind.

They were simply happy to attend and dreamt of renewed, continental glory. In spite of the – by South American standards – limited distance between Montevideo and both São Paulo and Rio de Janeiro, many had struggled mightily to get there.

In fact, most ordinary supporters were simply priced out. Ticket prices ranged from $200–$650. In Brazil, the minimum salary is a paltry $196 with unemployment and inflation on the rise. Detached from reality, CONMEBOL – alongside tour operators, airlines and hotel owners – contrived to render the final the playground of the great and the good, the rich and the famous. Palmeiras didn't even sell out their allocation of 12,000 tickets.

With all the commercialisation and corporatisation, CONMEBOL risk losing the key asset: the final's authenticity that differs in every possible way from the often antisepic Champions League's showpiece match.

Supporters that did get to Montevideo – some by boat via Buenos Aires – wandered through a marvellous capital of blossoming blue Jacarandas and churrascarias barbecues. Downtown, they discovered the coffee house frequented by renowned writer Eduardo Galeano.

History struck them once they entered the iconic Estadio Centenario. The stadium received a facelift ahead of its 21st Copa Libertadores final. Flamengo fans reminisced about their first-ever continental crown in 1981, won by Zico and Co. at the very same venue against Chile's Cobreloa.

But this final was about modernity, both Palmeiras and Flamengo representing just that. Playing at Brazil's most modern stadium, the Allianz Parque, Palmeiras enjoy the backing of wealthy Leila Pereira, the first female president in the club's history. Flamengo have learned to monetise their fan base of some 40 million supporters.

In 2019, the Rio giants won the competition against River Plate, arguably South America's team of the decade with the venerable Marcelo Gallardo. The following year, Palmeiras succeeded Flamengo as the continent's king thanks to an extra-time goal from substitute Breno Lopes against local rivals Santos.

Both clubs reached the 2021 final on merit, but do not share the rivalry that marks some of Brazil's biggest fixtures. Palmeiras' arch-enemy is crosstown behemoth Corinthians, whereas in Rio de Janeiro, Flamengo and Vasco da Gama despise each other. The finalists' antagonism was – and is – rooted in a quest for hegemony in the modern Brazilian game. Together with Atlético Mineiro, they have pulled away from Brazil's other big clubs, outmuscling their domestic rivals through a combination of financial riches and quality squads.

Even so, both clubs endured a torrid

As early as spring Palmeiras supporters demanded Abel Ferreira's dismissal, criticising his team's dour style of play, but the club hierarchy stood by him. His shamelessly conservative style suits the squad at his disposal: defensive organisation forms the cornerstone of his homogeneous counter-attacking collective. But that approach didn't bring silverware in 2021 – Palmeiras failed to win the Supercopa, the Brazilian Cup, the South American Super Cup, the league, the São Paulo state championship and, above all, the Club World Cup.

At Flamengo, Renato Gaúcho was also tormented. Like his predecessors Domenec Torrent – a former assistant of Pep Guardiola – and Rogerio Ceni, he failed to emulate the success and swashbuckling football that rock star coach Jorge Jesus had introduced with a high-pressing modern game. Jesus' reign became a long, unprecedented and intense victory parade. In awe, the Maracanã serenaded him "Mister, Mister".

Mister's big merit was that he understood how to play Gabriel Barbosa (aka "Gabigol"), Bruno Henrique, Górgio de Arrascaeta and Everton Ribeiro. The attacking quartet simply swept past opponents, combining individual qualities, perfect communication and interchange. But in 2021 that front-line magic faded, even if Flamengo reinforced the squad with David Luiz, Andreas Pereira (on loan from Manchester United) and Kennedy, after the departures of Rafinha, Pablo Mari (essential to a high defensive line), and Gerson. Flamengo – capable of both the sublime and the ridiculous – were no longer winning, but simply slumping from failure to failure.

In a season-defining blockbuster, Montevideo, then, offered a chance at redemption, an opportunity to prove the critics wrong. Flamengo had navigated the semi-final with a 4–0 aggregate win against Ecuador's Barcelona while Palmeiras eliminated both Atlético Mineiro and São Paulo in the knockout phase. In an exercise of pre-emptive damage control, Renato Gaúcho said:

"In football, it's much easier to destroy than to construct. When you play a team like Palmeiras that sits back, it gets harder"

Flamengo coach Renato Gaúcho

"The most important thing is that Flamengo got here on merit. Palmeiras also got here on merit. In Brazil, only the winner is respected. In Europe, that's different. They value those who don't lift the trophy."

He added that Flamengo had a Plan A, B and C. Ferreira did; Renato Gaúcho, contrary to his claims, did not. The Portuguese outthought and outmanoeuvred his Brazilian counterpart. "In football, it's much easier to destroy than to construct," said Renato Gaúcho after the final. "When you play a team like Palmeiras that sits back, it gets harder."

But Palmeiras' attitude and aptitude should not have surprised anyone. Ferreira fielded a back-five defence, with Gustavo Scarpa, an attacking midfielder, dropping back to defend, similar to Chelsea's tactics against

Manchester City in the Champions League final. In the semi-finals, a five-man rear-guard had held off Atlético Mineiro and the successful formula again worked wonders against Flamengo. In the fifth minute, Mayke explored space in behind Filipe Luis and teed up Raphael Veiga, 1–0.

Palmeiras dropped deep. They could now play the academic football Ferreira professes: defend and lurk on the counter, all the while dominating and denying space. Their opponents, rattled, had no reply. Flamengo had the players to decide the final in a flash of an eye, to carry the match beyond the mundane, but too many protagonists were second best to Palmeiras' fit and hard-working XI.

Flamengo were apathetic. Did they tire? They had little excuse to.

Palmeiras were playing their 105th game in 387 days, with Ferreira lamenting that he couldn't "give his best" because "the Brazilian calendar is insane and inhuman." This was not the barnstorming Flamengo of yesteryear, but a feeble, disjointed group of players, with no leadership and no plan. In the 72nd minute, following a quick one-two with De Arrascaeta, Gabriel Barbosa equalised, aided by Weverton's failure to protect his near post.

Flamengo never impressed nor truly impressed themselves. Ferreira revelled in his opponent's impotence, weighing up the game like a chess match he would ultimately win. In extra-time, Deyverson, introduced for his selfless, energetic attitude instead of the more experienced Lulz Adriano, capitalised when Andreas Ferreira switched off, 2-1. The blunder was symbolic of Flamengo's defensive frailties. Ferreira shored up his midfield with Felipe Melo, the ultimate personification of his team: divisive, on and off the field, but unwavering. That grit, in a triumph for the collective over the individual, crowned Palmeiras for the second consecutive time and the third time in the club's history.

Copa Libertadores champions.

Champions...Palmeiras midfielder Felipe Melo lifts the iconic trophy

Exit...Renato Gaucho left Flamengo shortly after their final defeat

Vindicated, Ferreira became the most successful European coach in the history of the Copa Libertadores, moving ahead of Jorge Jesus and Mirko Jozić, the Croatian who guided Colo-Colo to the title in 1991. Two days after the final, Renato Gaucho and Flamengo parted ways.

Significantly, this was a third consecutive Brazilian win in the continent's premier club competition, highlighting the country's recent dominance of the Copa Libertadores. Even in 2018, when River Plate prevailed in "the final to end all finals" against arch-rivals Boca Juniors, Brazilian clubs had been favoured to win the tournament, but were undone by their defensive attitudes. Until 1991, Brazilian clubs had won five of 32 titles on offer since the competition's maiden edition in 1960, but gradually they prevailed, winning 13 of 27 editions before 2018. The times, then, are changing.

MALTA

Shaking things up

The head of Maltese football has big plans for the island nation

MFA president... Bjorn Vassallo (credit: Domenic Aquilina)

The main boardroom at Malta's National Stadium at Ta' Qali is full of trophies. That would be expected in the home of many national associations, but there is some irony at this gleaming collection.

The Malta Football Association (MFA) was founded in 1900, joined FIFA in 1959 and made their competitive debut five years later, when the island secured independence from Britain, but the national team has not collected any senior trophies.

Malta's 3-0 win over Cyprus at Ta' Qali in September 2021 was only their third-ever win in World Cup qualifying – and their first at home. Even the marvellous new football museum at Ta' Qali celebrates close defeats amid a handful of memorable victories.

Malta's lack of success is harder to gauge when compared to similar sized European nations. The island has a population of 460,000 and football is easily the most popular sport ahead of water polo and rugby.

Yet while Iceland – population 354,000 – qualified for a major tournament and Luxembourg have made consistent progress, Malta's best performance in a qualifying campaign was the five points accumulated in the Euro 2008 qualifiers.

Coming off the back of a 2-2 draw in Slovakia, that win over Cyprus seemed to suggest that Devi Mangia's team had turned a corner. The next two results brought narrow defeats in Slovenia and Russia and when Malta secured a 2-2 draw in Nicosia, the 2008 tally of five points had been emulated.

Then the Malta of old returned. Instead of surpassing that figure, Mangia's team were battered 7-1 and 6-0 at home to Croatia and Slovakia, respectively. Those results left Malta bottom of Group H on goal difference behind Cyprus.

Sitting in that boardroom at Ta' Qali, the MFA president Bjorn Vassallo promises: "In my mandate, I will spend a lot of money on resources to improve the technical side and the development so we do not get isolated results but constant growth in our national teams."

"My main ambition is for the performance of the national teams, but my plan got shaken up."

Those plans range from taking over the running of junior leagues to a €50m redevelopment of the 17,000-capacity National Stadium. Most games in Malta's Premier League are played at Ta' Qali, as many clubs do not have facilities to stage games. The Tony Bezzina Stadium in Paola only has one stand for spectators and owners Hibernians FC prefer to play at Ta' Qali.

Of Vassallo's "shaken up" proposals, the most eye-catching was a plan to enter a team of Malta's best players into the Italian third tier, Serie C. The outbreak of the COVID-19 pandemic scuppered that idea, which had not been greeted with universal acclaim.

Some locals were concerned that Malta's best players would need support from foreign players to compete and that would mean the MFA subsidising wages of overseas players.

The plan is now on the backburner but Vassallo is better placed than most leaders of small European national associations to understand their place in the game's eco-system. His career as a football administrator started in the small Maltese town of San Gwann. By 2010 – aged just 30 – he was MFA chief executive, had joined various committees in UEFA and in 2016 left the island for a full-time job at FIFA as director for Europe.

Three years later, he returned home with his young family after being elected as the MFA president. Norman Darmanin Demajo had held the post for nine years and the election was relatively close. Vassallo won 83 votes against 54 for MFA council member Chris Bonnett and wants to bring unity.

"Before, the MFA invested in the infrastructure for the clubs and that was quite right," says Vassallo, whose strategy covering the period 2020–2024 titled "We Can Perform Better" will change the game in Malta completely.

The plan for a club in Serie C attracted the most attention, but his main priority is to increase the number of players from Malta who are playing professionally overseas. Traditionally, this has been a major obstacle. Family is a major priority to the Maltese and persuading young players to take a gamble and leave is difficult.

Michael Mitsud, who has a record 143 appearances for Malta, played in Germany, Scandinavia, England and Australia and is still involved at 40 for Mosta but few others have come close to emulating this local legend.

Zach Muscat is with Casa Pia in Portugal and 20-year-old Alexander Satariano joined Italian Serie B outfit Frosinone in 2021. Forward Kyrian Nwoko was also loaned by Valletta to side have less tenuous links, such as the two Italians, Birkirkara FC defender Enrico Pepe and Valletta striker Mario Fontanella, who were both awarded citizenship after five years playing in the Maltese leagues.

Those short-term fixes helped boost results. "With the good results we got, people started to believe," says Vassallo, who is widely believed to want to stand as the island's president in the future.

Asked if Malta can ever qualify for a major finals, Vassallo produces a politician's reply. "Why not?" he says. "If others have done it, then why not? We just need to work hard with

Of Vassallo's "shaken up" proposals, the most eye-catching was a plan to enter a team of Malta's best players into the Italian third tier, Serie C

Irish side St Patrick's this season. The national team's star also plays abroad. Teddy Teuma, who features for Belgian top-flight side Union Saint-Gilloise, was born in France but has a Maltese grandfather. Other reinforcements for Mangia's dedication and have a plan, but we need to be together."

That plan is focused on raising standards. To develop better players, the MFA created regional hubs in the north and south of the main island and on neighbouring Gozo. The best young players get 230 hours of training a year with national coaches. Vassallo has made important changes to win over the players and the clubs.

Carlo Mamo, a former international and president of the Malta Football Players' Association, explains: "After the insistence and pressure made by MFPA and FIFPro, in June 2020 the transfer fee at the end of the contract and also a compensation which had to be paid for youth players were abolished. This system was phased out of football worldwide after the landmark Bosman ruling 24 years ago but only now in Malta."

"Mr Vassallo also made important changes in the governance of the organisation. Up until a few months ago the players union did not have a voice and no voting power at federation level. Now we have one seat on the highest forum which is the executive committee and the players can voice their concerns through the players union."

The clubs have also formed their own association as part of a radical overhaul of how club football operates. Vassallo wants the top flight to become a "privatised league" with the clubs taking responsibility for the commercial aspects such as sponsorship and TV rights. As part of these changes, foreign investors will also be permitted.

Buying a Maltese club is difficult as members vote in presidents, who can be ejected by a vote at the next election. As a result, presidents can be reticent to invest and with little money from tickets, TV or sponsorship, Maltese clubs have a precarious existence.

Periodically, foreign investors arrive promising to put money into Maltese clubs but the results have not been particularly auspicious.

Syrian businessman Yahya Kirdi had already been linked with a string of failed bids for clubs ranging from Liverpool to Vicenza, Carlisle United and English non-league club Morpeth, when he arrived in Malta in 2017 promising to invest in Naxxar Lions. Two years later, he tried to sue the club's committee for €600,000 in a Canadian court.

Only this season, Hamrun Spartans were excluded from the Champions League over a match-fixing incident dating back to 2012-13, when the club's committee got involved with shady Bulgarian investors. Those investors are long gone, but, despite an appeal, the club were still excluded, which was harsh on local developer Joseph Portelli, who became Hamrun's president in 2020.

Portelli has spent heavily on players and veteran Ivory Coast international striker Seydou Doumbia was rumoured to be on wages of around €10,000 a week. That would be a record if true, but top players such as national team players can still earn as much as €5,000 a month.

Opening clubs up to foreign investment may bring more money to attract better players from abroad and drive up standards, but investors will want to see a way of making a return. Vassallo is well aware of what has happened previously and says that the MFA will bring in a form of Fit and Proper Persons test to vet potential new owners before the rules change.

There are some Italians involved with Marsa FC but the latest investment in Maltese football has come from Scotland. Edusport – an academy based near Glasgow that trains and educates young French players – expanded to Malta in October 2021. Chris Ewing, who owns Edusport and also the Scottish semi-professional club Caledonian Braves, says: "As far as I was concerned it was a no-brainer to invest there. Malta is in the European Union; they all speak English and the weather's good all year round."

"The challenge is how you allow the investment. It's a double-edged sword as they need to improve the national team but they have a limit of foreign players, which may put off some investors. The good thing is that there is a Champions League spot."

The recent success in UEFA competition of well-funded clubs from the likes of Gibraltar and Luxembourg shows there is a place for teams from smaller European countries. Vassallo's ambition is that Malta's clubs can join them and provide further impetus for the national team that would help his strategy pay off.

BINATIONAUX

Hundreds of players at this year's AFCON will be members of Africa's European Diaspora. Mark Gleeson explores the increasingly common theme

The lure of competing in a major tournament means there will be a bevy of new players on display at January's Africa Cup of Nations, as participating countries turn to the Diaspora to beef up their squads for the tournament.

It is no longer only on the dusty fields of Africa where the majority of international talent begin their journeys. As much as countries still seek their next stars on home soil, they now also actively search among the migrant communities in Europe for ready-made talent to bolster their chances.

The French call them "Binationaux", and players of African descent born and/or raised in Europe are changing the face of the continent's top tournament.

For years now, countries that were former colonies of France and Portugal have taken advantage of a steady stream of players who are the children of migrants to enhance their chances in the Cup of Nations World Cup.

More so now, former British colonies look to the English leagues to see what they can find to bolster their squads while Equatorial Guinea, one of the continent's smallest countries, have qualified on the back of a side where most of the players are Spanish-born but with African heritage.

That is not unusual, nor a recent phenomenon. Algeria famously played France in Paris in a friendly in 2001 with six French-born players in their line-up. The 23-man Algeria squad that won the last Cup of Nations in Egypt in 2019 had 14 French-born players and nine home-born.

The players from Europe have the advantage of a good basic training in the game, a competency that is perhaps lacking in the players that learn on the streets of Africa. Proper nutrition, too, ensures a better physicality.

Their influence, however, can also pose problems, particularly around the balance of the squad. At the 2002 finals in Mali, there was an almighty schism between the home-born players and supposedly more erudite additions from Europe in the Moroccan squad, leading to punch-ups and players being sent home. Not surprisingly, Morocco were eliminated early, despite being among the pre-tournament favourites.

These days it is less of a balancing act, with most players based at clubs in Europe, but coaches still tread warily.

Most African football associations now have active scouting networks and court players to commit their international futures to the cause of the country of their heritage, rather than of their birth.

On rare occasions, there has been a veritable tug of war over top talent,

Ordeal... Morocco eventually won the battle to enlist Manir El-Haddadi like Morocco winning the battle of the heart with the Netherlands over Hakim Ziyech; or stories of folly like the allegation that when Kylian Mbappé's father suggested to Cameroon they might want to consider looking at his son for their junior national team, a federation official demanded a bribe-type payment first.

For the most part, the Binationalou are players who have a fleeting chance at playing international football for the European country of their birth but are much more likely to get capped by their African country of heritage and can be easily persuaded by the chance to participate in a Cup of Nations final – or even better the World Cup.

It can either be a choice of the heart or one of pragmatism. French-born Andy Delort suddenly decided well into this Ligue 1 career he wanted to play for Algeria a few months before the 2019 finals. They were keen, too, on the striker and, because his mother was Algerian, he was quickly naturalised in time to be selected for the tournament.

"Life is complicated, we discovered each other a little later. It's a personal decision. I want to wear the Algeria jersey," Delort said at the time.

Again, in the months leading up to the finals in Cameroon, there has been some assiduous courting.

Sometimes it is a process, as former Democratic Republic of Congo coach Florent Ibenge explained: "I invite them to come and play a friendly match so that they come to see how it works, and leave them to decide."

Playing a friendly does not commit a player's international future to one country.

The size of the squads for this tournament has been raised to 28 players, which means there will be 672 players registered to compete between January 9 and February 6. It would be accurate to suggest that, once the squads are finalised, several hundred will be European-born.

Hosts Cameroon managed to persuade midfielder James Lea Siliki to play after many years of persuasion. He is a former French junior international and has quickly become a valued squad member, if not yet a starter.

Galatasaray right-back Sacha Boey, recently injured, and Angers left-back Enzo Ebosse are being earmarked for a switch of nationality and, once approved by FIFA, could be included in the squad for the tournament.

All players who have played representative football for one country must seek a formal switch from world football's governing body, although are only disqualified from changing if they have won senior caps at competitive level. Even then if they have played no more than three senior games before the age of 21, they can switch after a three-year wait period. This is how former Spain international Munir El Haddadi will be lining up for Morocco at the Cup of Nations finals.

Guinea's federation invited RB Leipzig's teenage midfielder Ilaix

Moriba to watch their World Cup qualifier in November in the hope he might be persuaded to play this month.

The 18-year-old was born in Conakry but raised in Spain and played for the Spanish junior national teams while at Barcelona's La Masia academy. He moved to the Bundesliga for a hefty €16 million fee amid reported interest from the likes of Manchester City and Tottenham Hotspur.

Mohamed Bayo and Saidou Sou are two Ligue 1 regulars who have already made a recent decision to play for Guinea, while Mali are reportedly seeking a real coup in trying to lure Lyon striker

There will be 672 players registered to compete at AFCON 2021. It would be accurate to suggest that, once the squads are finalised, several hundred will be European-born Senegal have been looking for a right-back for some time while regular choice Youssouf Sabaly struggled with injury.

On the left side of defence, Milan's Fode Ballo-Touré is also new, having switched allegiance in March, and taken the place of Moussa Wague. Abdou Diallo of Paris Saint-Germain can also play in that position but Senegal used him as a centre-back in the recent World Cup qualifiers. He is also a recent convert from the France Under-21 side and another considerable catch.

But Cisse has not stopped there. Marseille's highly-talented defensive midfielder Pape Gueye switched from France to Senegal and made his debut in November. "I have gone to Senegal many times, my father travels there often.

He talks to me a lot about the country and I have pride now to be able to defend its colours," Gueye said after his first cap.

Cisse is now courting Gueye's club-mate Boubacar Kamara, who the Senegal coach feels will further shore up the middle.

It can be something of a gamble to disrupt an efficient line-up with that many new additions, but the added quality could be the recipe Senegal seek as they go in search of their first continental title.

These are all players who might well have gone onto play for France, and the tension continues to rise over the number of Binationaux who come through the French system but end up playing for other countries.

But for as long as Les Bleus are winning major titles, it is an issue on the backburner.

Senegal manager... Aliou Cissé

Up for grabs...the AFCON trophy

The wait is over

Twice-delayed tournament finally ready to begin in Cameroon

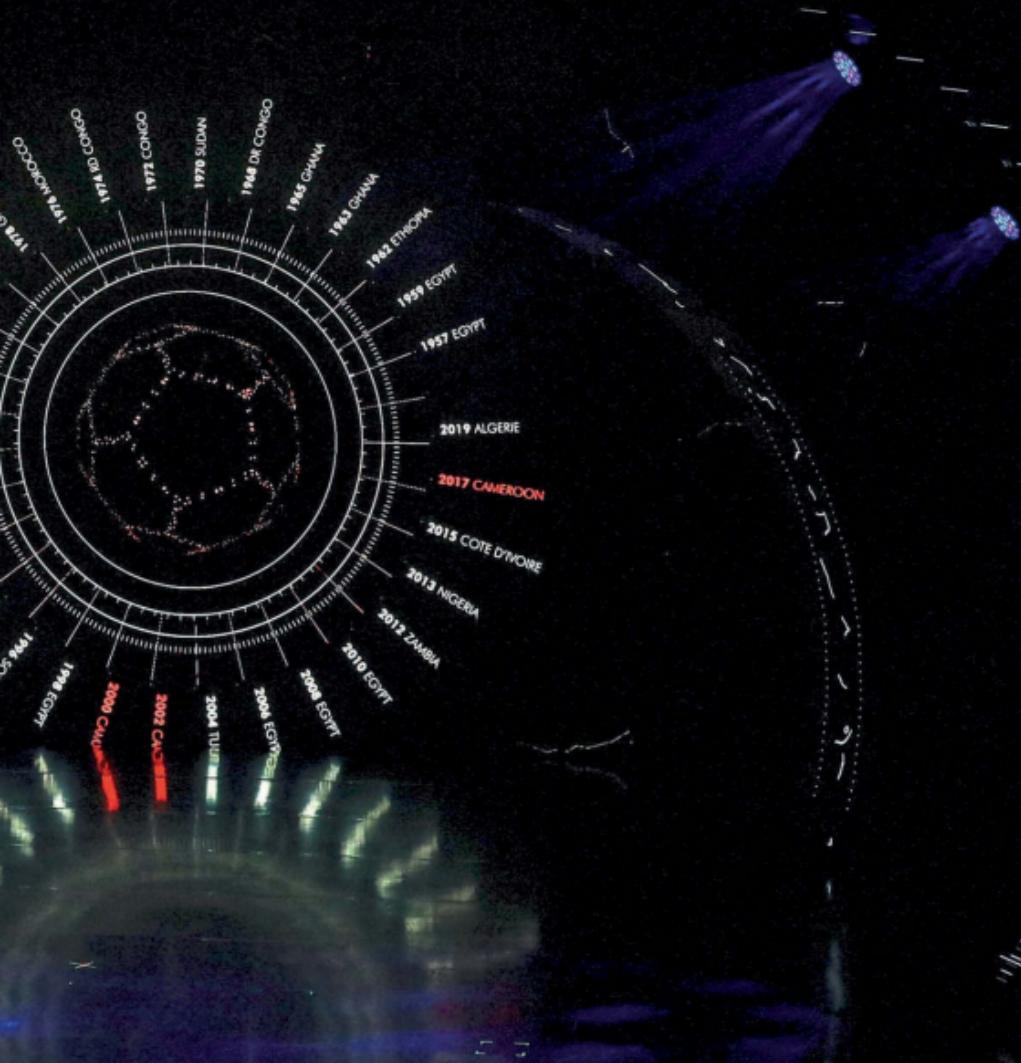

Algeria have broken records with their consistency since taking the last Africa Cup of Nations finals in Egypt in 2019, but it is again an open field when the continental championship finally kicks off in Cameroon on January 6.

The continent has rarely been dominated by one country over an extended period of time. Egypt won three AFCON titles in a row from 2006 to 2010, while also failing to qualify for two World Cups in the process.

Algeria's long unbeaten run going into the tournament is no guarantee of success. Djamel Belmadi's side might have gone 33 games without defeat, up to the conclusion of November's World Cup qualifiers, but their recent displays were not overwhelmingly convincing and the vagaries of tournament play are such that they will be among a list of potential winners rather than overwhelming favourites.

There is the usual threat from North African countries Egypt and Morocco, and from Nigeria, Ghana, Ivory Coast and Senegal in the west, plus hopes for the home nation, finally getting to host the event. ▶

2021 AFRICA CUP OF NATIONS PREVIEW

Holders...Algeria lifted the trophy in 2019

It was due to be hosted in 2019 but delayed by two years because the Confederation of African Football (CAF) – after numerous nervous inspections – felt they were not ready. There was a flurry of stadium construction but little else in the way of infrastructure in a country that has seen little upgrade since independence more than a half-century ago.

The COVID-19 pandemic then pushed back the hosting of the tournament a further 12 months.

Cameroon's new stadiums are now ready but other facilities are poor and it could prove a real test of endurance for those staying past the opening round.

The tournament will kick off and finish at Yaounde's new Olembe Stadium, which has a capacity of 60,000. New stadia was also built in Bafoussam (Kouekong Stadium) and Limbe (Limbe Stadium), which is closer to the separatist fighting in the English-speaking Southern Cameroons region, where there is a breakaway bid.

There have been threats against the tournament from the "Ambazonia" separatists, recalling the horror attack by Cabinda separatists on the team bus of Togo at the start of the 2010 Cup of Nations finals in Angola.

It is again a 24-team tournament (for the second time), which means 16 of the 24 countries progress past the first phase – the top two in the six groups plus the four best third-place finishers.

An additional knockout round adds to the excitement and opens up opportunities for upsets, as seen at the last edition when minnows Berin and rookies Madagascar made it to the quarter-finals, while hosts Egypt were upended by South Africa.

Egypt will have legitimate ambition of redressing that home failure this time around,

Algeria's long unbeaten run going into the tournament is no guarantee of success particularly since Carlos Queiroz has taken over as coach.

However, there is a long tradition of the Arabic-speaking North African countries struggling in sub-Saharan Africa.

Hosts Cameroon, who last won in 2017 under Hugo Broos in what was an upset result in Gabon, will have the burden of home expectation, but this generation has little of the quality of past Indomitable Lions teams which thrilled the competition with their aggression and determined approach to the game. For the hosts to have any chance they will need a tide of home support to carry them over the finish line.

This could be the tournament where Under pressure...

hosts Cameroon

Senegal finally break their duck and win the African crown. They were runners-up to Algeria last time out and also lost on penalties in 2002 to Cameroon but, if they reach the final in Yaounde on February 6, they could make it third time lucky.

Sadio Mane and cohorts have proven efficient in qualifying competition and look ready now to mount the winners' podium.

The expanded field has allowed more new faces to compete, with the Comoros Islands and Gambia taking part for the first time. To be fair, Gambia won their qualifying group, so would still have qualified to a 16-team tournament, too.

Qualification for both borders on a fairy tale, but they will have high hopes of proving their worth in the opening days of the competition.

It means there are now only ten of Africa's 54 member countries that have never qualified for the finals.

This is the 33rd edition of the continental championship and of the 14 past winners ten are present: Congo, DR Congo, South Africa and Zambia did not qualify. The 34th will follow in some 18 months, moved back to a mid-year date and hosted by the Ivory Coast in June-July 2023.

TONI CONCEICAO

"The most difficult experience I've had in 30 years of coaching"

The manager of AFCON 2021 hosts Cameroon discusses his team's chances of victory on home soil

What are Cameroon's chances of winning the Africa Cup of Nations? Is there enough depth in the squad to go all the way?

It's going to be very hard for all the teams, without exception. Obviously, in order to have the goal of reaching the semi-finals or the final, we will have to work hard; we will have to be a very strong and very consistent team.

As far as our chances go, the ambition will be to go as far as possible and to try to win the title. We know that we play at home and that the public will demand our presence in the final. We have to be very cool and work hard and make sure there are no mistakes along the way. As for the squad, the important thing is that we have good players from an individual point of view and that is a fact. But in order to get all the way to the final, I will need a very strong collective strength, because otherwise we will have problems.

Sometimes the home expectation can be unrealistic ahead of such a tournament. How stifling has it been in Cameroon?

Expectations are high but we aren't hiding away from that. We really want to get as far as possible; we are ambitious because we know that the Cameroonian people demand this from the national team. The history of the team is great: they've won the Cup of Nations five times, been to seven World Cups and won the gold medal at the Olympics, so you can understand why the people demand success. I think there is a climate of optimism but we'll have to work hard to keep all the emotions in check.

So, are you confident your players can handle the burden of expectation?

The players are imbued with great ambition. Obviously, the last Nations Cup was not positive for Cameroon [round of 16 exit to Nigeria], but we have been building for two years now with this squad. It's a very cohesive, very happy group.

We will work not only from a physical and tactical point of view, but also from an emotional point of view, which is important for the players because the pressure will be great.

How important was it to win the last World Cup qualifier against Ivory Coast in November, and secure your place in the last phase of World Cup qualifiers?

This victory was very positive because of the confidence that the team gained; these victories allow them to believe in themselves more. More confidence obviously brings more motivation and it means that when we regroup at the end of December for the Cup of Nations, the spirit will be even higher.

From the moment we lost to Ivory Coast in our first group game in September, we knew the return match [in November] would be a final for us. A draw or a defeat would have taken us out of the World Cup fight and so from that point of view it was very positive to win the match.

We also had a preparatory win over Nigeria [a friendly in June] and these kinds of performances help the team to grow. The win over the Ivoirians didn't bring us a title or anything, but a morale achievement of confidence and, above all, belief for the Cup of Nations and then obviously for the play-offs in March.

We have to be honest and recognise that if we hadn't eliminated Ivory Coast, there would have been misgivings about the team. Now the supporters of the national team believe that this team has the capacity to fight for the Cup of Nations. The opinion of many people regarding the national team has changed for the better.

What is your expectation of the opening match against Burkina Faso, who are an unpredictable team?

We know that Burkina Faso are at a very high and competitive level. They didn't get through to the next phase of the World Cup qualifiers, but they didn't lose any games in their group either including two against Algeria, one of the best teams on the African continent.

Therefore, we expect a difficult game in the opener. On top of that, an opening game of such a big tournament tends to be a very emotional affair with massive public interest. This creates an adrenaline; let's see if the adrenaline is going to be positive for us. That's what we hope.

What about the rest of the group? You already played against the Cape Verde Islands in qualifying and they did not go well for Cameroon?

If we have aspirations of winning the group, we cannot drop points against teams like Cape Verde and Ethiopia. It is imperative that we beat them to move onto the next stage.

How pleasing was it to see goalkeeper Andre Onana back from suspension, and how much of a difference can he make at the tournament?

Andre couldn't join up with the squad for the nine months of his suspension and that was a real pity for us. Not only because of his indisputable footballing quality but fundamentally because of his character. He was greatly missed by the squad and, as soon as we could, we put him straight back into the team. Immediately he brought his sporting quality and an enhancement to the spirit in dressing room, which is very important to have.

Karl Toko Ekambi has also overcome a barren scoring run and has been the leading scorer in the early stages of the Europa League...

He also scored a decisive goal for us that not only highlighted his importance to the team, but also that he is a very intelligent player who knows how to read the game well. He knows how to operate in the box and I would say that he is a player we need to teach a lot. He is very important to us.

How did you get the Cameroon job?

It was a process that started two and a half years ago. I have a long-time friend, connected to the Cameroon federation, who recommended me. I had meetings with people from the federation and the Ministry of Sport, and things developed one meeting after the next. They were feeling me out because I know they had other options.

I was very glad that they chose me. I'm satisfied. I have a very good working group from a human point of view and now we are going to give the Cameroonian what they want: work and results.

This is your first job in Africa. How have you found that, a lot different to working in Europe?

How much time have you got? I could spend hours talking about it! It is certainly, by far, the most difficult experience I've had in my 30 years of coaching.

What about the World Cup in Qatar? Are Cameroon going to qualify?

I expect us to do for it. It would be the highlight of my career and it would be exceptional for the country. It will also be exceptional for many of the players who will have an only, and last, chance to appear at a World Cup. There is no higher level in your career.

Interview by Mark Geeson

6 of the best

Potential stars in Cameroon

Mark Gleeson highlights six players to keep an eye on at the Africa Cup of Nations finals

1

MOROCCO

The 25-year-old central defender made a major impact in Ligue 1 last season and has continued his outstanding performances at the back for Rennes this campaign.

A product of the Mohamed VI academy in his home country, Aguerd missed out on a chance to sign for Valencia at 17, and later again at Malaga, but persevered and finally got his opportunity at Dijon.

At 6ft 3ins tall, he has a commanding presence and is absolutely outstanding in the air. At Rennes his technical ability has been encouraged as well.

He was still playing in Morocco when he won his first cap in 2016, but only over the last two years has he cemented his place in the national team line-up – playing every single minute of Morocco's World Cup qualifying campaign.

2

SIERRA LEONE

The former Liverpool, QPR and Tottenham Hotspur defender, now playing club football in Turkey, missed the last preparatory match for Sierra Leone in November as his application to FIFA for a switch in international allegiance was still being sought by his new country.

Caulker played, and scored, for England in a friendly match against Sweden back in 2012 so is entitled to make the change – as he also qualifies for Sierra Leone citizenship – and his inclusion in the squad would be a huge fillip as the West African country goes to the finals for the first time since 1996. Caulker's grandfather is from Sierra Leone.

The 29-year-old centre-back played a non-official game against Morocco's A team in October but will have little time to get to know his team-mates before the tournament kicks off.

3Amadou HAIDARA
MALI

Haidara took a while to find his feet at RB Leipzig after moving from satellite club Salzburg but is now rated as a top Bundesliga midfielder.

His start in Germany, after a €19 million move, was hindered by a cruciate ligament injury but last season he got regular game time and is now a significant fixture in the Leipzig line-up, where he took over the No.8 shirt previously worn by African compatriot Naby Keita.

There have also been three successive Champions League campaigns to confirm his potential.

The 23-year-old will be important to Mali's hopes of advancing past the opening round of the tournament in Cameroon, where they will fancy their chances after going unbeaten in the recent World Cup qualifying campaign.

4*NANU
GUINEA-BISSAU

The transition at club level from struggling Marítimo to Porto has proven tough for the 27-year-old, but at national team level Nanu is one of the stalwarts of the consistently surprising "Djurtus".

Guinea-Bissau's national team competes at a third successive Nations Cup finals, which will be a second for the right-back, whose rapid pace suggests he might be the fastest player at the tournament.

He adds an incredible attacking threat when going forward and is probably at his best on the front foot rather than defending.

Porto beat Sporting to his signature last year and, while the Portuguese-born Nanu played regularly in the second half of the last campaign, he has been sidelined this season.

5*Andre ONANA
CAMEROON

A nine-month doping ban looked to have little effect when the Ajax keeper returned to action in November to make some telling saves and produce a man-of-the-match performance for Cameroon in their decisive World Cup qualifier against the Ivory Coast.

He played two matches and showed no ring rust despite his Dutch club deciding the 25-year-old can sit on their bench ahead of an anticipated sale in January. Inter are high on the suitors' list although Onana is expected to attract widespread interest after being rated among the best keepers in European club football.

He is a product of the Samuel Eto'o Academy and was a junior at Barcelona from the age of 14.

6KAMALDEEN
Sulemana
GHANA

The potential to be Africa's next superstar attacker is evident already in the 19-year-old, who is a product of the Right to Dream Academy and FC Nordsjælland before joining Rennes last summer for €20 million.

Kamaldeen was earmarked for an early age for a quick transition to the top and his time in Ligue 1 would seem a stepping stone to one of the bigger leagues, while the Cup of Nations finals is the proper stage to help increase his profile further.

He is quick and clever, and former Ghana youth team coach Didi Dramani reckons he could be as prolific as Kylian Mbappé.

2021 AFRICA CUP OF NATIONS

PREVIEW

GROUP A

Hosts... Cameroon will be playing on home soil

CAF founding members... Ethiopia

CAMEROON

Home advantage is always handy in these tournaments, although the last hosts to win were Egypt in 2006 – and even then they needed a penalty shootout to ensure success.

Cameroon have plodded through since their surprise Cup of Nations triumph in Gabon in 2017, when they were not fancied and, truth be told, rode a wave of some good fortune before taking the trophy.

This generation is far removed from all the conquering teams of the 1980s or the era of Samuel Eto'o, when they were back-to-back winners in 2000 and 2002.

But there is the hope they can build momentum and provide a credible challenge for the title.

KEY PLAYER

Eric Maxim Choupo-Moting has never been consistent in making himself available for Cameroon but, with possible World Cup qualification looming, the 32-year-old German-born Bayern Munich forward has played his part recently and has the talent to drive the team's attack and hopes.

THE COACH

Toni Conceicao, 60, is a former Portugal international right-back, who replaced Clarence Seedorf after the last Cup of Nations finals. Had a patchy career as a club coach in multiple countries but managed to hang onto his job despite some mediocre form.

"Leading the line... Choupo-Moting"

BURKINA FASO

A workmanlike team who are difficult to beat, as African champions Algeria discovered in the World Cup qualifiers, and with a penchant for creating an upset.

It is a lack of resources, and depth in their squad, that holds them back from higher achievement but their potential was evidenced in 2013 when they got all the way to the final.

There are a handful of survivors from that side who will be seeking to repeat the feat in Cameroon, although a place in the knockout stage is likely to be their immediate ambition.

"Les Etolons" are back after failing to qualify for the last finals in Egypt in 2019 which ended a run of five successive appearances.

KEY PLAYER

Aston Villa's Bertrand Traore has struggled with a thigh injury recently, with concern over the 26-year-old winger's fitness for the tournament dominating their preparations; he is key to their hopes of a successful campaign.

THE COACH

Kamou Malo has been coach since mid-2019 as Burkina Faso turned away from a preference for employing European coaches and handed responsibility to one of their own, banking on the 58-year-old's success in winning domestic league titles to help the fortunes of the national team.

"Seeking upsets... Burkina Faso"

CAPE VERDE

One of the continent's smallest nations, with a population of around 500,000, continue to punch well above their weight, albeit with most of their players drawn from the large emigrant communities in the Netherlands, Portugal and the USA.

This is the third time they have qualified, having reached the quarter-finals in their maiden appearance in 2013, when their coach burst into song at the post-match press conference, and again in 2015, when they went home undefeated.

They qualified for these finals by finishing unbeaten, beating Cameroon 3-1 in Praia and holding them to a goalless draw away from home.

KEY PLAYER

Speedy winger Ryan Mendes, 31, will captain the team as their most experienced and valuable player, having competed for the Cape Verdeans at their last two Cup of Nations finals appearances following his national team debut back in 2010.

THE COACH

The 51-year-old Pedro Leitao Brito is better known as "Bubista" and spent 14 years as a defender in the Cape Verde team, serving as captain before embarking on a coaching career with a bevy of local teams and then getting the national team job two years ago.

"Overachieving... coach Brito"

ETHIOPIA

One of CAF's founder members, and former winners, but long past their glory days despite a burgeoning league and a large population.

Athletics might bring Ethiopia Olympic medals and international recognition but it is a passionate footballing country, frequently left disappointed by the failings of their national team.

They won a key game in the qualifiers against fellow contenders Madagascar to snatch second place in their group, behind Ivory Coast, and return to the finals for only the second time in 21 editions.

But in the recent World Cup qualifiers they managed only a single victory in six games and will not have any lofty ambitions in Cameroon.

KEY PLAYER

The 29-year-old captain Getaneh Kebede, back home after a spell in South Africa, has often proved something of a one-man show, producing match-winning displays for his country, while also ensuring they play an eye-pleasing brand of attacking football when things are going their way.

THE COACH

Wubetu Abate has had a long career coaching clubs in Ethiopia and winning the league title, and had a spell across the border in Sudan, before being appointed national team coach in September 2020 on a two-year contract.

"Slipper... striker Getaneh Kebede"

Beaten finalists...
Senegal were the 2019 runners-up

GUINEA

"Syl Nationale" had a convincing qualifying campaign to get into the finals but then imploded in the World Cup preliminaries between September and November, firing coach Didier Six in the process.

The tactful Frenchman likely contributed to his own demise, but the country's cause was not helped by a military coup in September that had Guinea briefly banned from hosting any football, thereby impacting their hopes of a credible tilt at World Cup qualification.

Guinea used to be a power in African football in the 1970s, and were runners-up in 1976, but remain inconsistent participants.

But they are capable of causing waves and, with a bit of momentum, may prove spoilers in Cameroon.

KEY PLAYER

Naby Keita has struggled with injury of late, some of it picked up on international duty, and has not been as regular as he might have liked for Liverpool. But when fit, the midfielder is very much the talisman for his country and gives them an added impetus.

THE COACH

Ex-Arsenal, Marseille and PSG striker Kaba Diawara stepped in as caretaker coach at the end of the World Cup qualifiers in November. If the 45-year-old keeps the role for the tournament, he will be one of the youngest and most inexperienced on the bench.

Talisman...
Naby Keita

MALAWI

The "warm heart of Africa", Malawi is among the poorest countries on the continent and largely an also-ran in the African game.

This is just the third time they've qualified for the finals, following appearances in 1984 and 2010, where they started with a stunning 3-0 victory over Algeria but then lost the next two to be eliminated.

Subsequent accusations of match-fixing surfaced during the Wilson Perumal saga but have never been dealt with.

Malawi qualified for these finals by edging out Uganda in a decisive tie in March, but in the recently completed World Cup qualifiers they finished bottom of their group.

KEY PLAYER

Frank Mhango is also known as "Gabadinho" and is a former Golden Boot winner in the South African league with Orlando Pirates. The 29-year-old has a reputation for a quick turn and devastating pace but he has been struggling with form of late.

THE COACH

Meke Mwase followed a well-trodden path for Malawian footballers to South Africa as a professional, also playing centre-back for his country, and has come through coaching the junior national teams to first serve as caretaker and now permanent coach since the 2019 departure of Belgian Ronny Van Geneugden.

Out of form...
Gabadinho

Three in a row...
Zimbabwe have qualified for their third consecutive AFCON finals

SENEGAL

Senegal are still searching for their first AFCON success, having been runners-up at the last edition in 2019. They also lost, on penalties, in the 2002 final to Cameroon and will be among the favourites for the title, boasting a high-quality squad.

Increasingly the national team draws its players from the migrant community overseas, thus boosting its chances of a place at the World Cup in Qatar in November.

It has also meant competition for places, which has seen an overhaul of the team in the two and a half years since the last Cup of Nations.

Anything but victory will be considered a failure given how they have romped through both Cup of Nations and World Cup qualifying over the last 18 months.

KEY PLAYER

Talisman Sadio Mane commands respect from both team-mates and opponents alike, with the Liverpool ace showing a strong dedication to his national team and the cause of delivering a first major title to the "Lions of Teranga".

THE COACH

The 45-year-old ex-Birmingham City, Portsmouth and PSG defender Alliou Cisse leads Senegal at a fourth major tournament, having also captained the country at the 2002 World Cup in Japan and South Korea, where they shocked holders France in the opening game and reached the quarter-finals.

National icon...
Sadio Mane

ZIMBABWE

A swathe of natural talent makes Zimbabwe a dangerous outfit, but they are badly let down by the foibles of their administrators and the economic malaise in country.

After completing their World Cup qualifying campaign without a win, the nation's FA was suspended by the government, who accused it of not accounting for money it had been given from the public purse to prepare for their last Nations Cup appearance in 2019.

The risk of being kicked out of the tournament loomed large, but there has since been some backtracking by the government to avoid any confrontation with FIFA.

This is the third successive Cup of Nations finals that Zimbabwe have qualified for – before that they had been to only two.

KEY PLAYER

Tino Kadewere scored ten goals in Ligue 1 last season for Lyon but is struggling now with form and injury. The striker, who turns 26 on the eve of the finals, will be looking to the tournament for a much-needed boost.

THE COACH

Norman Mapeza, who has made Platinum FC the top club side in Zimbabwe, returned for a fourth stint as coach on a three-month contract in September for the World Cup qualifiers. He was expected to stay on and take the team to Cameroon.

Mapeza celebrates

Fairy tale...Comoros will play at their first AFCON finals

Upset...Morocco suffered a shock exit to Benin in 2019

COMOROS

A veritable fairy tale for the small island nation, whose colonial links with France mean they have a large migrant community in Marseille, which is where the coach and bulk of his players hail from.

Comoros are one of the newest members of world football. They only joined FIFA in 2005 and first entered qualification for the Cup of Nations and World Cup in 2010.

They didn't win their first competitive international until 2016 – at their 21st attempt – when they beat Botswana 1–0 at home in the 2017 Cup of Nations preliminaries.

In the five years since, their progress is remarkable and they reached their first AFCON finals after a qualifying campaign that saw them unbeaten until their last game in Egypt, by which time they had already secured their berth.

KEY PLAYER

El Fardou Mohamed Ben Nabouhane, 32, known simply as "Ben" is the Comoros' all-time top scorer and has a ratio of more than a goal every other game since joining Red Star Belgrade in 2018 from Greek club Olympiakos.

THE COACH

Amir Abdou coached amateur football in France when he was asked to serve as assistant coach, only for his proposed boss to pull out, thrusting him into the hot seat, where he has been since 2014.

Coach...
Amir Abdou

GABON

There is often a sense Gabon's "Panthers" are a one-man outfit, capable of producing results when Pierre-Emerick Aubameyang is available, but bereft of any chance on the frequent occasions he is not playing for the national team.

His father, Pierre, was captain of Gabon when they first qualified for the finals in 1994 and the family dynasty looms large over football in the central African country, whose oil wealth has seen them host the tournament twice.

Gabon's best return was a quarter-final place in 1996 and again as co-hosts in 2012, when Aubameyang missed the decisive penalty in a shootout that saw them eliminated by Mali.

They qualified for these finals as runners-up to The Gambia, but ahead of DR Congo and Angola, who both have strong teams.

KEY PLAYER

The 27-year-old Denis Bouanga often fills in for Aubameyang as the lead attacker and has got several key goals for Gabon. He will enjoy the break from Ligue 1 where he has featured regularly for struggling Saint-Etienne this season.

THE COACH

Patrice Neveu has been a regular on the African circuit with previous spells in charge of the national teams of Niger, Guinea, DR Congo and Mauritania before taking up the Gabon post in March 2019.

Front-line...
Aubameyang and Bouanga

GHANA

The Black Stars last won the AFCON in 1982 and each passing edition without success has been the cause of growing frustration, particularly as there have been a large number of close misses.

They are four-time African champions, a record bettered only by Egypt (seven) and Cameroon (five), but the 40-year wait will be a burden hanging over the heads of the current crop of youngsters.

Ghana got as far as the semis six times in a row between 2008 and 2017, reaching the final twice, but at the last tournament in Egypt they exited early in the last 16.

The sudden emergence of several potential international stars holds out hope that Ghana can make a breakthrough, although this tournament might come too soon.

KEY PLAYER

Thomas Partey is the engine of the Black Stars, who is heading for a third successive Cup of Nations finals appearance, and will be hoping to make more of an impact with the team this time round as the 28-year-old has the ability to drive the team on.

THE COACH

Milovan Rajevac answered an SOS from Ghana during the World Cup qualifiers in September, returning to the job where the 67-year-old Serbian made his name by guiding them to the 2010 World Cup quarter-finals.

Midfield engine...
Thomas Partey

MOROCCO

Morocco have arrived at the last two AFCON finals heavily fancied to go home with the title, but in 2017 went out in the quarter-finals and two years later suffered an embarrassing elimination at the hands of tiny Benin in the last 16.

Again they will be fancied, even if their side has been given a huge overhaul in the last two years by an ever-tinkering coach.

Vahid Halilhodzic excluded Hakim Ziyech and Noussair Mazraoui, the duo he accused of feigning injury to avoid playing a friendly, but offered opportunity to the likes of Imran Louza and Adam Masina (both Watford), Aymen Barkok (Eintracht Frankfurt) and the former Belgium U21 international Ryan Mamee.

Morocco have only once before won the Cup of Nations – in 1976 when it was hosted in Ethiopia.

KEY PLAYER

Spanish-born Achraf Hakimi, now 23, debuted for Morocco at 17 and has been a regular over the last five years, while also cementing his reputation in club football, as evidenced by the €60m fee PSG paid to sign him from Inter in July.

THE COACH

Former Yugoslavia striker Vahid Halilhodzic coached Ivory Coast at the 2010 AFCON and Algeria at the 2013 finals, but did poorly at both and this tournament is a chance for the irritable 69-year-old to set that record straight.

Wing-back...
Achraf Hakimi

EGYPT

The Pharaohs have won more Cup of Nations titles (seven) and been to more finals (25) than any other country but flopped at home at the last edition in 2019.

They went into December's Arab Cup unbeaten since their elimination by South Africa in Cairo at the last finals, but it has been a run without conviction – so much so that coach Hossam El Badry was sacked in September without losing a game.

Egypt have several players left in the team from the squad that lost to Cameroon in the 2017 final and their profile means they are always counted among the favourites.

What the Egyptians have in their favour is self-belief from consistent dominance of the club game on the continent and experience of tough conditions playing in other countries.

KEY PLAYER

Mohamed Salah last scored a goal for his country in March but provided several key assists in the recent World Cup qualifiers and is very much the talismanic influence on the team, who sometime have an overreliance on the ability of the 29-year-old Liverpool star.

THE COACH

Carlos Queiroz was born in Mozambique and spends a lot of time in Africa but his reputation comes from coaching stints at Real Madrid and Manchester United, plus World Cup final appearances with Portugal and Iran.

GUINEA-BISSAU

It will be the third successive Cup of Nations finals for the small West African country, whose reputation as a rogue and dysfunctional state is the opposite to the growing prominence of their football team.

They were ranked 195th in the world a decade ago after irregular participation in major tournament qualifiers but rose up to a high of 68th place when they were shock qualifiers for a first-ever Cup of Nations appearance in 2017.

Like another former Portuguese colony, Cape Verde, they've turned to the migrant community in Europe to significantly strengthen their side.

They went out early in both previous appearances and are still to win a game at the tournament, which will be their primary aim in Cameroon this time round.

KEY PLAYER

The electric 26-year-old winger Mama Balde hails from Sporting's prodigious youth factory but has belatedly made his breakthrough in France at Dijon and Troyes, with almost 20 Ligue 1 goals since arriving in 2019.

THE COACH

Baciro Cande had his first stint as coach of the national team from 2003–2008 and the 54-year-old was reappointed in 2016, becoming something of a folk hero at home, where he has won nine league titles with Sporting Bissau, five of them in successive years.

NIGERIA

A far from convincing World Cup qualifying campaign between September and November had the Super Eagles once again pushing the panic buttons.

Although they did win the group, there were two poor home displays against the Central African Republic and Cape Verde, whose depth is so far inferior to that of the continent's most populous nation.

Nigeria are three-time AFCON winners, the last in 2013 in South Africa with an untried and untested team that grew in momentum as the tournament progressed.

There are similar elements about this team as well, to remind us that Nigeria can never be written off. But how they cope without injured star striker Victor Osimhen, who fractured an eye socket for Napoli in November, remains to be seen.

KEY PLAYER

Wilfred Ndidi is closing in on 50 caps for Nigeria and has proven an increasing mainstay of the side, with the 25-year-old midfielder now regularly transferring his form from Leicester City to the national team.

THE COACH

The 68-year-old Gernot Rohr was appointed Nigeria coach in 2016 but had his deal extended after qualifying the Super Eagles for the 2018 World Cup in Russia. Has been under intense pressure though, with rumours he will be sacked prior to the AFCON kick-off.

SUDAN

Sudan will likely have just one foreign-based player at a club in neighbouring Egypt, in their squad as they compete at the finals for the first time since 2012, securing their place by upsetting South Africa in a decisive qualifier in March.

Sudan are former winners, back in 1970 when they were hosts, but this is only the fifth time they have qualified for the finals since.

Having a home-based squad means there is the advantage of longer preparation, without the constraints of the FIFA window for internationals, plus Sudan also participated in December's Arab Cup in Qatar.

But whether that will see them well-honed for the Cup of Nations finals remains to be seen. They are all too often lacking in confidence.

KEY PLAYER

Right-back Ather El Tahir moved to Egyptian side Smouha from Al Hilal Omdurman in Khartoum in 2020, with the 25-year-old a rare export from a country where playing for one of the top clubs offers among the best salaries in African football.

THE COACH

The 62-year-old Frenchman Hubert Velud was the coach when Togo's team were attacked in Angola's disputed Cabinda province ahead of the 2010 finals, and shot in the arm during the attack that killed three people.

Holders... Algeria go into the tournament as favourites

Point to prove... Ivory Coast are keen to make up for failing to qualify for the World Cup

ALGERIA

The holders will go into the tournament on the back of a run of 33 unbeaten matches at the end of the November World Cup qualifiers, not far off the record that Italy set in September.

Success for Algeria in Egypt in 2019 was only their second in the Cup of Nations, and their first since winning on home soil in 1990, but was achieved in impressive fashion.

Coach Djamel Belmadi has built a veritable "golden generation" for Algeria, rivalling the side that went to the World Cup in Spain in 1982 and beat West Germany.

But he will know better than most the travails of trying to ensure consistent success in African football, and particularly in a tournament with as many potential pitfalls as in Cameroon.

KEY PLAYER

Riyad Mahrez has been part of Algeria's side since the eve of the 2014 World Cup, just months after his move to Leicester City, and the 30-year-old has the distinction of having scored in the last three Cup of Nations tournaments.

THE COACH

The 45-year-old Djamel Belmadi's playing career took in stints at Paris Saint-Germain, Marseille, Manchester City and Southampton, and he captained Algeria at the 2004 Cup of Nations finals, taking over as coach in 2018.

World class... Riyad Mahrez

EQUATORIAL GUINEA

The two previous participations of the "Nazafang Naciono" in the Cup of Nations have been as hosts, first along with Gabon in 2012 and then as an emergency stand-in when Morocco pulled out in 2015.

On both occasions, they have performed beyond expectation, reaching the quarters in 2012 and semi-finals in 2015, when their loss in Malabo to Ghana set off a fierce riot by frustrated spectators that needed helicopters and armoured vehicles to quell.

This time, the team has qualified through the preliminaries, finishing behind Tunisia in their group but edging out Tanzania and Libya.

After years of hiring Brazilians, turning them into instant citizens and national team stars, Equatorial Guinea are now a more legitimate operation with players mainly from Spain, the former colonial power.

KEY PLAYER

Emilio Nsue has been captain since his debut in 2013, having previously played for Spain at junior level, and although at 32 his club career looks to be in limbo, he is still Equatorial Guinea's go-to man.

THE COACH

Juan Micha, 46, played for Equatorial Guinea and then went to Spain to coach, returning home to first take charge of the women's team and then various age group sides before signing a one-year contract last February.

Returning... Juan Micha

IVORY COAST

Failure to advance in the World Cup qualifiers puts a damper on the prospects of "Les Elephants", whose decisive game against Cameroon in November was played without winger Wilfried Zaha, who allegedly asked to be excused from international duty.

While the story was that he had picked up a virus on his previous African trip one month earlier and not yet shaken it off, missing out on such a key game suggested trouble.

The Ivorians will, however, see the Cup of Nations as a chance for redemption and certainly know their way around the tournament.

This will be Ivory Coast's 24th appearance at the finals – only Egypt have been to more – and their ninth tournament in a row.

KEY PLAYER

Franck Kessie has an air of maturity and experience well beyond his 25 years and drives the Ivorian side from midfield like a natural successor to Yao Toure, who captained Les Elephants to the Cup of Nations title in 2015.

THE COACH

Aged 43, Patrice Beaumelle will be among the youngest coaches at the finals but he has considerable Cup of Nations experience as assistant to Herve Renard when he won the 2012 title with Zambia and again in 2015 with Ivory Coast, the job Beaumelle took in 2020.

Midfield drive... Franck Kessie

SIERRA LEONE

There was much controversy about Sierra Leone's qualification for the Cup of Nations finals – their first appearance since 1996.

The COVID officer at their last qualifier at home to Benin – where they had to win but their visitors needed only avoid defeat – declared that key Benin players had failed their PCR tests and could not play. Benin then refused to take to the field in protest.

Amid the COVID-19 testing row, which saw another proposed clash of the two nations postponed, the game was rescheduled for a third time in June – and Sierra Leone won 1–0 to qualify for only the third time.

They will be expected to be one of the first casualties of the tournament in Cameroon.

KEY PLAYER

Yayah Kallon broke through in Genoa's first team at the start of the season and kept his place in the side and, although still only 20, could provide the quality that the Leone Stars need – although his refugee status in Italy needs to be sorted first before he can travel.

THE COACH

Manchester-born John Keister played in the lower reaches of the Football League as well as coaching at non-league Margate. He kept in touch with his roots in Sierra Leone though, and is now in his second spell as national coach.

Genoa wonderkid... Yayah Kallon

Overcoming adversity... Mali didn't play a home game in World Cup qualifying

Stalwarts... this is Tunisia's 15th AFCON appearance in a row

GAMBIA

This is a first-ever appearance at the finals for the small West African country, who finished top of their qualifying group ahead of Gabon, and eliminated both Angola and the Democratic Republic of Congo.

It is testament to their Belgian coach Tom Saintfiet, who managed to coax resources from a near bankrupt federation and an equally poor sports ministry to give his squad an optimal chance.

There are a surprising number of Gambian players competing in Europe – some of them former refugees – and a decent pool of talent to choose from.

The draw also offers the Scorpions the chance to make it past the first round, and into the knockout stages, at their first attempt, as long as they keep their defensive discipline and do the job on the counter-attack.

KEY PLAYER

The 23-year-old Musa Barrow is effective either on the left of the attack or as a centre-forward. The Bologna man will be the player Gambia look to for inspiration and experience at the finals.

THE COACH

Tom Saintfiet hails from Mol in Belgium and has had an incredible ten different assignments as a national team coach but, for the 48-year-old, the Gambia has been his best return.

First finals... Tom Saintfiet

MALI

One of the better teams to have never had previous success at the AFCON finals, Mali could play a major role in this tournament.

This is an eighth successive tournament appearance for "Les Aigles", who finished third in both 2012 and 2013.

Their best performance to date was as runners-up to Congo way back in 1972 – the last time the tournament was hosted in Cameroon.

The fact they were banned from playing at home during the recent World Cup qualifiers yet still easily won their group is indicative of their ability, building on players from the Diaspora as well as success at junior level in continental competition.

KEY PLAYER

Full-back and captain Hamari Traore, who stars for Rennes in France and will turn 30 during the tournament, has been a model of consistency for Mali since his debut in 2015 and played at the last two finals in 2017 and 2019.

THE COACH

Mohamed Magassouba took over the Mali job in 2017 but was caretaker coach for two years before a permanent appointment was made, which was a second national team job for the 64-year-old after also previously coaching the Democratic Republic of Congo national team in the 1990s.

Ex-caretaker... Mohamed Magassouba

MAURITANIA

The primary reason Mauritania emerged from almost nowhere to qualify for the last AFCON finals was the time that coach Corentin Martins was given to build the side.

It was the antithesis of the short tenures that usually characterise coaching African national teams and Mauritania were able to reap the rewards.

Former French international Martins went on to qualify the country for a second successive finals, losing only one game in their qualifying group, but was then inexplicably fired in October as they performed with far less distinction in World Cup qualifying.

The impact of a knee-jerk reaction from the federation could be a negative one.

KEY PLAYER

French-born 26-year-old Aboubakar Kamara was also eligible for Senegal but agreed in 2020 to throw in his international prospects with Mauritania. The former Fulham forward, now playing in Greece, adds an improved edge to their attack.

THE COACH

The 52-year-old Frenchman Didier Gomes Da Rosa was appointed in November, continuing a journeyman career over the last nine years in Africa where he has coached clubs in Algeria, Cameroon, Egypt, Guinea, Rwanda, Sudan and Tanzania.

Switching allegiance... Aboubakar Kamara

TUNISIA

The North Africans are a model of consistency in the African game, extending their record number of successive appearances at the finals to 15, having not missed a tournament since their hosting in 1994.

During all that time, they have posted a solitary success (as hosts in 2004) and were semi-finalists two years ago. They invariably get out of the group stage, having succeeded in ten of the past 14 tournaments.

A lack of depth in their squad means that for all their solidity, they probably lack the cutting edge needed to go all the way and win the event again.

But there is always the potential their workmanlike approach could deliver again after all these years.

KEY PLAYER

Wahbi Khazri, the Corsican-born Saint-Etienne forward, will be competing in his fifth finals tournament and, at the age of 30, might be aiming for a few more before retirement.

THE COACH

Mondher Kebaié was a welcome break from the long list of foreign coaches Tunisia had continued to appoint when the 51-year-old was a surprise choice for the post in August 2019, after having worked at the country's top three clubs – Club Africain, Esperance and Etoile du Sahel.

Fifth finals... Wahbi Khazri

TWO IN A ROW FOR LEWANDOWSKI

Robert Lewandowski named World Player of the Year for the second consecutive year

ince the World Soccer awards first began in 1982, only Michel Platini, Ronaldo, Ronaldinho, Lionel Messi and Cristiano Ronaldo have ever been named World Player of the Year in back-to-back years. Now, Robert Lewandowski's name can be added to that illustrious list.

Continuing where he left off in 2020, the Bayern Munich and Poland striker was in scintillating goalscoring form once again as he surpassed the seemingly unbreakable Bundesliga record of the late, great Gerd Müller. With 41 league goals, he overtook the Bayern legend's tally from the 1971–72 campaign, thereby securing his first-ever European Golden Shoe. For most of our panel, that was enough to win their vote.

Still, missing out on the Champions League, or international glory with Poland, meant that Lewandowski's competition for this year's award was much stiffer than last year.

Winning the Copa America with Argentina put Lionel Messi right back in contention after finishing a distant third in 2020; Jorginho becoming a European champion for both club and country made the Italian midfielder a popular choice, while Mohamed Salah's breathtaking start to the season put him right among the contenders too.

We asked the voting panel to select five players in order, with their first choice receiving five points, second place receiving four points, and so on. Interestingly, if we had only asked for one name, Jorginho would have taken the runners-up spot, rather than third where he ultimately ended up.

The UEFA Player of the Year can console himself by being one of the key men in this year's World Soccer Men's Team of the Year: Italy. Their manager, Roberto Mancini, was also a runaway leader in the Men's Manager of the Year, with only Chelsea and Thomas Tuchel rivalling them as challengers.

It is rare for a team to win the award while also ending their year so disappointingly. Italy's failure to qualify for next year's World Cup automatically was made all the more surprising by their excellence in the summer. Indeed, it continues an extraordinary narrative for the team and their coach: Mancini was rightly hailed for lifting his country from the despair of failing to qualify for the 2018 World Cup in Russia to European champions. Missing out on Qatar would be another extraordinary twist in the tale but, nevertheless, their

Team of the Year...Euro 2020 champions Italy

Euro 2020 performance makes them worthy winners.

In the women's categories, there was a clean sweep for European champions Barcelona, the manager that guided them to last season's Champions League, Luis Enrique, and their captain, Alexia Putellas.

By sweeping aside Chelsea 4-0 in the final in Gothenburg, Barca ended the reign of Lyon, who had won the previous five titles – including 2019, when they beat the Catalan side in the final.

Just like their men's team under Pep Guardiola a decade ago, Barca have, at times, played football on another level to the rest of Europe, and their clean sweep of honours is demonstrative of their dominance.

Only Olympic champions Canada, and their English coach Bev Priestman, offered any kind of challenge in the voting, while Putellas' nearest rival was her Barcelona and Spain teammate, Jennifer Hermoso.

Clean sweep...Barcelona's Alexia Putellas lifts the Champions League trophy

ROBERT LEWANDOWSKI

World Player of the Year

Of all the elite players to have been overshadowed by the astonishing achievements of Lionel Messi and Cristiano Ronaldo in the last decade, few have remained as consistently prolific as Robert Lewandowski. He may have had to wait until beyond his 30th birthday, but the Poland marksman has now moved out of that shadow and established himself as the world's best centre-forward.

In 2020, he was rewarded for spearheading Bayern's treble-winning outfit, recognised as the best player in the best team; the outstanding cog in an incredible machine. This year though, it's been all about him. Other than their entirely predictable retention of the Bundesliga crown, the Bavarians failed to hit the heights of the previous season, and in doing so they proved just how much they rely on Lewandowski.

They missed him badly in the Champions League quarter-final defeat to Paris Saint-Germain, when a rare knee injury ruled him out of both legs. It is also hard to imagine that Bayern would have suffered their shock second-round exit from the 2020-21 German Cup to Holsten Kiel if their talismanic striker had started the match.

The sheer volume of goals that he scored was frightening. Gerd Müller's record of 40 in one Bundesliga campaign had stood for almost 50 years before last season; not only did Lewandowski break the record, he did so having played five fewer games. Indeed, last season was the first time that the Pole had played fewer than 30 league games since he arrived in Germany back in 2010. That didn't stop him from producing his most prolific campaign, winning the first Golden Shoe of his career in the process.

There were plenty of other records that Lewandowski sent tumbling along the way, too. He scored in 13 consecutive home league games, a Bundesliga-record streak that included 24 goals; he broke a Bayern record by scoring in 19 consecutive games in all competitions, a run that ended in October; he won his fourth Bundesliga Golden Boot in a row, and sixth in total, moving within one of another of Müller's all-time records; and he surpassed Klaus Fischer on the league's list of all-time top scorers to move into second place – again, behind Müller.

After 12 games of the current campaign, Lewandowski had already scored 14 Bundesliga goals, taking his overall tally to 291, Müller is on 365, while the Germany legend also leads in the Bayern record books, with 563 goals to Lewandowski's 319.

Lewandowski turned 33 in August and, usually, it would be fair to assume that time is running out for him to catch Müller. But his exploits over the last couple of years have forced us to reconsider what a player's peak years should be.

"It's how football is now," said his former manager Jürgen Klopp recently. "33, 34 – that's the best age of a footballer: you understand the game better, you can judge the pitch better, you can see situations long before they will happen."

Ronaldo and Messi continuing to score goals well into their 30s could be explained as part of their usual convention-defying excellence, but the Bayern man's form hints at a wider trend. The likes of Neymar, Mohamed Salah and Harry Kane, who are all approaching their 30th birthdays, will be taking note: their best years may yet be ahead of them.

"Age is only a number and, with my experience and preparation, I know I can play on at the top level for a few years longer," said Lewandowski recently, after collecting the Golden Shoe trophy. "Maybe, like wine, I can grow even better with age."

Bayern certainly hope so, as do Poland. Lewandowski scored three goals for his country at Euro 2020 – his best-ever return at a major tournament – but it wasn't enough for them to advance from the group.

Even with his ability to defy the ageing process, Qatar 2022 may be his last opportunity to play at a World Cup. He has done everything within his power to get there. Poland lost two games in qualifying – 2–1 defeats to England and Hungary – the only two games in which the captain did not play. He had a hand in more than a third of their total goals, scoring eight and assisting another four. When they face Russia in the play-offs in March, they will need him to deliver once again.

Getting to Qatar, and then reaching the knockout stages, will be among the top of his targets for 2022, as will reclaiming Bayern's European crown.

Player of the Year...Robert Lewandowski

The evidence of this year shows that, as long as he's playing, both teams have every chance of achieving their goals.

And if he does tick off all of those objectives? This time next year, we'll probably be discussing the first player to win this award three times in a row. Jamie Evans

ROBERTO MANCINI & ITALY

World Manager of the Year, World Team of the Year

W as it all just a Midsummer Night's Dream? The fact that Italy and Roberto Mancini have won both World Soccer's Team and Manager of the Year awards serves to remind us that, recent negative results notwithstanding, 2021 was indeed a magical year for Italian football.

Italy's triumphal march down the road to redemption, from the 2017 elimination from the Russia World Cup to Euro 2020 triumph, achieved by playing Mancini-inspired, quality football was undoubtedly one of the great highlights of the year.

When the Giampiero Ventura-coached Italy crashed out against Sweden in November 2017, that disaster represented Italy's worst football moment of the last 60 years. Not since the World Cup elimination in 1958 at the hands of Northern Ireland (who ironically have just played their part in prompting a potential repetition of that elimination, with that 0-0 Windsor Park draw) had a result prompted such nationwide dismay and soul-searching.

Champions...Azzuri centre-back Leonardo Bonucci raises aloft the Euro 2020 trophy

The long march back to the top table of international football began six months later with the appointment of 56-year-old Roberto Mancini, a sumptuously talented player who, unlike his predecessor, had a highly impressive coaching CV, having led both Internazionale and Manchester City to league title successes.

Mancini effected a Copernican revolution, essentially replacing the traditional Italian defensive mentality with a surprisingly attacking mindset. Himself a gifted, quality player, Mancini put his trust in a penchant for good football and good footballers, those with "pede buon" (literally "good feet").

Key to Mancini's takeover was the creation of a very tight-knit management unit, comprising old friends and companions in arms: Gianluca Vialli (delegation head), Gabriele Orioli (team manager), Fausto Salsano and Attilio Lombardo (assistant coaches). No coincidence that three of these four played with him in the 1991 Serie A title-winning Sampdoria side, whilst Onnali worked alongside him during four highly-successful seasons as coach to Inter (2004–08).

By the time Italy arrived at the delayed Euro 2020 finals on the back of a 27-match unbeaten run, the revolution was steaming along. The quality of Italy's football marked them down as serious contenders, notwithstanding the squad's tournament inexperience and the lightweight nature of a team that revolved around little "good'uns" such as Marco Verratti, Jorginho, Nicolo Barella and Lorenzo Insigne.

A 3-0 demolition job on Turkey in their opening game confirmed that these Azzurri might be just as good as many of us had believed. From then on, Italy and Mancini got very little wrong

A 3-0 demolition job on Turkey in their opening game in Rome confirmed that these Azzurri might be just as good as many of us had believed. From then on, Italy and Mancini got very little wrong. A second-half wobble against Austria in the second round, a penalty shootout win against Spain in the semi-finals and Luke Shaw's second-minute goal in the final came close to sinking them but the overall enthusiasm, resilience and class of this team survived it all.

Not for nothing, Mancini observed after the Austria game, their first sudden-death tie of the tournament, that his side could now "just sail on without a bother". His reasoning was that, having absorbed that fright and having proven their physical resilience, the Azzurri were now good to go all the way.

In the end, Italy v England was the dream final, a clash not only between two great footballing nations but also one between arguably the two most in-form teams of the tournament. In the opinion of many, too, Italy were full value for their Euro 2020 final win, given the consistently high quality of their football (their 2-1 quarter-final win over Belgium is a case in point).

Inevitably, Italy's win was greeted not just with nationwide rejoicing but also nationwide relief in the wake of that bitter humiliation back in 2017.

In a perfect serendipity, that relief was twinned with another, more important national resurrection for Italy, namely the seeming emergence from the COVID-19 pandemic, which has claimed 133,000 lives in Italy.

To some extent, this Italian team's success plugged itself into a much needed "feel good" moment, one that represented a partial exorcism of the COVID-19 trauma. Player after player during the tournament dedicated their success "to all those who have suffered and lost loved ones because of COVID".

Mancini has taken Italy down a new road and Italians have seen something they have never seen before from their national team, namely a side that played intense attacking, one-touch football – a sort of tiki-taka, Italian style.

Even if Italy subsequently managed to throw away a World Cup qualifying group win that had seemed in the bag (if you miss a penalty in both matches against your closest rivals, Switzerland, you are clearly tinkering with disaster), all is not lost. Mancini still believes that his side has the quality and class to win its way through the new two-match play-off process.

Dejected...Maurizio Locatelli after the 0-0 draw in Belfast

While defeat to North Macedonia (or Portugal or Turkey) in the play-offs would add a stunning chapter to the remarkable story of Mancini's Italy, it would also be a great pity if an Italy team of this quality, style and bravura did not make it to Qatar next November.

LLUIS CORTES & BARCELONA

Women's World Manager of the Year, Women's World Team of the Year

There hasn't been much for fans of Barcelona Men's team to celebrate over the past 12 months. The departure of Lionel Messi and the financial woes his exit emphasised, combined with the failure to properly compete for La Liga or the Champions League, has meant that the Nou Camp has been a fairly depressing place in 2021. For Barcelona Femení, however, it's been an entirely different story:

Their near-perfect year saw them become the first Spanish side to win the Women's Champions League, doing so by demolishing WSL champions Chelsea 4-0. Barcelona thus became the first club in history to win a Champions League title for both its men and women's sides.

They were just as devastating domestically. Lluís Cortes' team ended the 2020-21 league season with 33 wins out of 34, finishing the title-winning campaign with a record-breaking 99 points from the maximum 102. A sole 4-3 defeat to Atlético Madrid prevented them from ending the season unbeaten.

Their total of 167 league goals was more than double the tally of the league's second-most prolific side, rivals

Real Madrid (75). By conceding just 15 times, they ended the season with an astonishing goal difference of +152.

As if that wasn't already impressive enough, they then beat Levante 4-2 in the final of the Copa de la Reina in May to become the first Spanish women's side to complete the continental treble.

Perhaps their only real blow of 2021 came just under a month after their Copa success; Cortes announced his decision to step down as manager of Barça Women's team after two and a half seasons in charge, citing physical and emotional strain as his reasons.

"When I took over, I told my friends and some of the players that I would never leave until this team wins the Champions League, and we did it," he said in a video recorded for the club.

"It has been a lovely period for me. We have experienced so many emotions with this group of people. Winning our first treble has made us extremely happy, but it has also been a very tough season. We started training on July 10 and until now that has been 353 days of very hard work, effort, being together.

"With all the conditions surrounding COVID, I think this season has worn a lot of us out, both physically and emotionally.

"Right now I don't feel I have the energy to keep leading this team. The best team in the world needs a coach who can drive them, be contagious and transmit strength to the group and I don't feel able to do that right now. It has been a very draining year."

As well as their first Champions League, the Cortes era ended with two league titles, two Copas de la Reina and a Copa Catalunya. His 89 per cent win percentage in all competitions made our of the players that helped Barca to last season's treble feature in the top seven of this year's Women's World Player of the Year vote, with Alexia Putellas and Jennifer Hermoso finishing first and second on the podium respectively.

It marks an incredible haul of honours for Putellas in 2021, who was crucial in Barcelona's treble-winning campaign and subsequently became the first Spanish winner of the UEFA Women's Player of the Year and Women's Ballon d'Or, as well as Spain Women's Player of the Year.

She's registered over 55 goals and assists for club and country this calendar year, including a penalty in the Women's Champions League final and a brace in the Copa de la Reina final, in which she was also named Player of the Match.

The departure of Vicky Losada in the summer to Manchester City saw the attacking midfielder take over the captain's armband on a permanent basis, and it didn't take long for her to lift her first trophy: Barca beat Italian champions Juventus 6–0 in the inaugural Women's Gamper Trophy in August.

"In the Gamper game my teammates said to me that I had to train lifting trophies because up to now I had not done it," she revealed in an interview with the club. "It is a special moment but you are not on your own, the important thing is the path you have chosen to get there and how you did it."

Barcelona renewed her contract in September for a further three years, and she celebrated later that month by netting one of the fastest hat-tricks in the club's history. She scored three goals in four minutes in the 8–0 victory over Valencia, one of which was a spectacular strike from 40 yards out.

The 27-year-old also made history for La Roja in 2021, surpassing Marta Torrejón's record for national team appearances with her 91st cap in their Women's World Cup qualifying victory over Ukraine in October.

it a tough act to follow, but Barca are showing no signs of letting up under Jonatan Giraldez – Cortes' former assistant.

The Catalans started the 2021–22 season with ten league wins from ten, 58 goals in their favour and just two against. They also topped their Champions League group at the halfway stage, with three wins from three, including a 4–1 dismantling of Arsenal.

As Giraldez continues to make his mark on the squad, Cortes is embarking on a similar mission as manager of Ukraine Women's team. Interestingly, he'll face some of his former players in September 2022, as Spain and Ukraine meet in Group B of the qualifying phase for the 2023 World Cup. Whatever the outcome, we'll likely see some warm embraces on the pitch at the final whistle.

THOMAS TUCHEL

Champions League winner and second in the World Soccer Manager vote

Borussia Dortmund chief executive Hans-Joachim Watzke and Paris Saint-Germain director of sport Leonardo would not have particularly enjoyed seeing Chelsea boss Thomas Tuchel make an instantly impressive impact at Stamford Bridge in the second half of last season, steering his new side to Champions League glory thanks to splendid victories over Atletico Madrid, Porto, Real Madrid and Manchester City.

While in charge of Dortmund (2015–18) and PSG (2018–20), Tuchel spectacularly fell out with both Watzke and Leonardo, thus leaving himself ripe for the sack. Now, however, the boot is on the other foot, with the Bavarian-born coach firmly ensconced at the pinnacle of the European game. Not bad for someone whom the PSG high command jettisoned on Christmas Eve 2020 – a mere four months after leading the Parisians to the silver medal in the Champions League – and who often was lambasted in the French media for not giving the Parc des Princes outfit a recognisable playing identity and for not keeping a tight rein on star names Kylian Mbappé and Neymar.

What Tuchel achieved at Chelsea in just a few months last term can only be categorised as phenomenal. Under previous Chelsea boss Frank Lampard, the Blues had been labouring badly, sloppily tactically, demotivated and disunited. All this would change dramatically with the perfectionist Tuchel on the case. Here was a masterclass in righting an apparently sinking ship. Every call a roaring success: considerably upping the organisation and intensity levels, rebuilding confidence and especially transforming the back-line into the most impenetrable of units.

The 48-year-old is a details man and the Chelsea pros have clearly responded to that strong hand on the tiller. Tremendously competent as well as visionary, he was just what Chelsea required.

Tuchel's reputation as the spiky, obsessive control freak has caused him problems in the past. But certainly not with Chelsea, where everyone swears by his powers to mobilise a group, prepare an immaculate game plan and create a winning culture. Working in the Premier League very much appears to have brought out the best in him. "I have the feeling that at the moment, I'm in the perfect environment," he told German sport magazine Kicker in August. "The training mentality of the players [in England], their dedication to the basics, warms my heart and makes every day a good one."

Strange as it may seem for a such a talented team builder and strategist, Tuchel has, up until quite recently, proved something of a love-hate figure, either rated as extraordinarily brilliant in his methods or totally overrated. The way he hit the ground running in west London should no doubt help to bring in a swathe of fresh converts. "People absolutely did not know what a great man and communicator Thomas Tuchel is," says legendary former Dortmund and Bayern Munich boss Ottmar Hitzfeld. "In the career of a coach, there are highs and lows. But at the end of the day, the pendulum always ends up striking on the side of those who deserve it."

CHRISTOPHE GALTIER

As Lille coach, Galtier defied all the odds by beating Paris Saint-Germain to the Ligue 1 title before leaving the club in the summer to join Nice, who are flying high and competing for a Champions League spot.

EDOUARD MENDY

A Champions League-winning and trailblazing goalkeeper

The list of African goalkeepers to play in the Premier League is a short one. Between them, Bruce Grobbelaar (Zimbabwe), Richard Kingson (Ghana) and Carl Ikeme (Nigeria) made 92 appearances in the competition. Of that trio, only the former can claim to have had a major impact on English football, accounting for two thirds of those appearances – although his peak came in the 1980s before the Premier League was formed. Kingson was a back-up at Birmingham City, Blackpool and Wigan Athletic, while Ikeme was Wolverhampton Wanderers' long-serving understudy, playing only one top-flight game.

It is fair to say, then, that Senegal's Edouard Mendy can already claim to be the finest African goalkeeper that the Premier League has ever seen.

And that has huge significance.

As Rory Smith wrote in the New York Times last year: "Black goalkeepers are chronically underrepresented in European soccer. African ones are even more uncommon." Mendy is bucking the trend, and becoming a trailblazer for other black and African goalkeepers.

When Chelsea recruited him at the start of the 2020-21 season, they insisted he was brought in to provide competition for then-record signing Kepa Arrizabalaga. In reality, he quickly became the undisputed first choice. After making his debut at the end of September, he kept six consecutive clean sheets in all competitions. By the end of 2020, he had only conceded ten goals in 18 games for his new club.

That form continued into 2021. Mendy ended the season with 16 Premier League clean sheets, second only to Ederson of Manchester City. In the Champions League, not only did he keep more clean sheets than any other goalkeeper, he also matched the competition's all-time record, with nine.

Unbeatable...
Mendy celebrates a man-of-the-match

That tally, of course, included the final itself. In Porto, Chelsea's well-organised defensive shape, the midfield screen provided by man of the match N'Golo Kante, and Manchester City's toothlessness meant the Senegalese keeper had relatively little to do, only making one save on the night. Yet just as he had done all season, he brought a calmness and assuredness that had been sorely lacking under his predecessor.

He also made history, becoming the first African goalkeeper to start a European Cup final since Grobbelaar in 1985, and only the third in history to be on the winning side, following the Zimbabwean (1984) and Benfica's Mozambique-born shot-stopper, Costa Pereira (1961 and 1962).

This season has continued in much the same way as the last one. Thomas Tuchel has built one of the tightest defences in European football, with Mendy an integral part of it. By the start of December, Chelsea had only conceded six goals – the fewest in the Premier League – with Mendy joint-top of the clean sheets chart with Ederson and Alisson.

Incidentally, the Brazilian pair have done plenty to banish misconceptions about their country's ability to produce world-class goalkeepers. Mendy, it seems, is well on the way to doing the same for African keepers.

SIMON KJAER

Denmark captain an inspirational figure on and off the pitch

Purely in terms of sporting accomplishments, 2021 was a vintage affair for the 32-year-old Milan and Denmark central defensive warrior: steady as a rock as his club sealed their first Champions League qualification since 2013, then skipping the Danish national team to a highly satisfying last-four berth at the Euro 2020 finals.

But much more significantly, he showed himself to be an outstanding human being, reacting with calmness, clarity and empathy when Denmark team-mate Christian Eriksen suffered a cardiac arrest during a European Championship tie against Finland in June.

Kjaer was indeed a lifesaver on that afternoon in Copenhagen, quickly realising the gravity of the situation, putting Eriksen in the recovery position, ensuring his airways were cleared and starting CPR prior to medics arriving on the scene. In an emblematic moment of football embracing humanity, Kjaer also encouraged his team-mates to form a protective ring around Eriksen as he was treated with a defibrillator and resuscitated. Kjaer the guardian angel, Kjaer the sentinel, Kjaer the compassionate, on hand to offer comfort on the pitch to Eriksen's partner, Sabrina Kvist Jensen.

That day in Copenhagen, Kjaer was a leader in every sense of the word and rightly – along with on-site and Danish federation medical staff – was awarded the UEFA President's Award for 2021. "Kjaer: a reason for pride," ran the headline in the Diario de Sevilla, a newspaper located in the Spanish city where Kjaer used to play.

True to his down-to-earth character, the much-travelled stopper – who in a nomadic career has worn the colours of no fewer than nine pro teams, including

Inspirational leader...Kjaer

Palermo, Wolfsburg, Lille, Roma and Fenerbahce – insists on shunning the individual accolades. "I'm not a hero," he explained to the Italian sports daily Corriere dello Sport in August. "I acted without thinking. My instincts guided me and I did what I had to do automatically. It's what anyone else would have done. This is the first time this sort of thing has happened to me. I hope it's the last."

"I was able to stay lucid, like all my team-mates. It was the work of the whole team. Obviously we would have done the same if it had been an opponent. That's it. The only thing that matters is that Christian is now OK. Only that's important."

One of the 30-strong shortlist for the 2021 Ballon d'Or award, Kjaer is living proof that there's always hope in difficult times. Before moving to Milan in January 2020, his career appeared to be in a cul-de-sac, only serving as a back-up for the likes of Atalanta and Sevilla. Now reborn and reinvigorated at the San Siro, he recently extended his contract with the Rossoneri until 2024 and fully expects to end his playing days in Lombardy. "2021 has been a crazy year for me. Milan are on the up and Denmark did well at the Euros and have qualified for the next World Cup. It's been a great time in my career and I wouldn't have achieved if I hadn't come to Milan."

SEBASTIEN HALLER

West Ham misfit makes headlines in Champions League and Africa

For Sébastien Haller, 2021 began by crawling out of a deep valley, but ended at the top of a mountain, the height of which he had never reached before.

Who would have thought everything would turn out so well when West Ham United offloaded the French-born striker in January after only 18 months? Their £45 million record signing struggled to adapt to the Premier League and was ultimately usurped by Michail Antonio as the Hammers' first-choice striker.

Haller was happy to join Ajax in a €22.5m deal and reunite with Erik ten Hag, the man who coached him at FC Utrecht. In return, the Amsterdam club were satisfied that they had found a top striker to dovetail with Dusan Tadic in their Europa League campaign.

However, that satisfaction soon turned to despair when Haller was mistakenly omitted from Ajax's Europa League squad list. A computer error, it was said; human error is more likely - team manager Jan Siemering simply forgot to add an extra name.

It was an error that would cost them dearly. The record-breaking signing, the last piece of the European jigsaw, wasn't allowed to play, and Ajax were knocked out by Roma in the quarter-finals.

Haller scored 13 domestic goals as Ajax won the double, but his focus was always on making his mark on Europe.

This season, he has more than made up for lost time. On his Champions League debut, he scored four against Sporting - the first player to do so since Marco van Basten at Milan in 1992.

And he remained on fire, becoming only the second player (along with Cristiano Ronaldo) to score in every Champions League group game in a single campaign, while he also became the first footballer in history to score in each of his first six Champions League appearances, as Ajax clinched qualification with time to spare.

Despite these numbers, Haller still has other people to convince; not everybody thinks he is big-league material - including Didier Deschamps.

At the end of 2020, Haller - who competed for France at the Under-17 World Cup in 2011 - declared for Ivory Coast, where his mother was born.

Just like the Champions League, he was an instant hit. After scoring on his debut against Madagascar in November 2020, he was on target twice in a crucial World Cup qualifier against Cameroon in September. With three goals in eight caps he is already shaping up to be Didier Drogba's successor.

Opting for the African country instead of playing alongside Kylian Mbappé or Antoine Griezmann? Haller has no regrets: "I'm not giving up anything - I did not go to the A-team and I do not regret this choice at all," he told France Football. "I'm glad I didn't go because otherwise I wouldn't have been able to reach Ivory Coast."

Since that costly admin error, Haller's career has been on the rise, and there's plenty more to come. In January he will spearhead Ivory Coast's attack as they chase their third AFCON title, before returning to do the same for Ajax in the Champions League. In 2022, he could ascend even greater heights.

Gold medal-winning coach getting the recognition she deserves

Bev Priestman's journey to Olympic gold began as a 12-year-old attending futsal sessions in her native northeast England. The classes were run by John Herdman, a part-time university lecturer, who combined the sessions with teaching sports science and coaching Sunderland youth teams.

Herdman's most high-profile graduate was Liverpool captain Jordan Henderson, but his real protégé is Priestman. Now, they work alongside each other in Canada; Herdman coaching the men's team to a rare tilt at World Cup qualification, and Priestman leading a women's team that ended years of near-misses by winning the Tokyo Olympic football tournament.

It is a long way from Consett to Canada, especially via New Zealand, which is where Priestman joined Herdman as his assistant for the international women's team. Having played briefly at Everton she realised she wouldn't make a top-class player; coaching offered an alternative route.

In four and a half years in New Zealand she learned a lot about coaching, before following Herdman to Canada, working with the youth programme and assisting the national team as they won a second consecutive bronze medal at the 2016 Olympics.

In 2018 Herdman took charge of Canada Men's team, and Priestman returned to England as Phil Neville's assistant with the Lionesses.

"The best thing I did was go back to England and work with Phil," she said later. "It was important to experience different ideas and a different way of working. But I wouldn't be here without the support I had from John."

The pair steered England to the 2019 World Cup semi-finals, but when Neville quit to coach David Beckham's Inter Miami, Priestman was overlooked as his replacement.

Back she went to Canada, arriving as first choice with the message: "We need to change the colour of the medal."

Nine months later Canada arrived in Japan with a reputation of being hard to beat, with the great Christine Sinclair finally on the wane, struggling for goals.

That turned out not to matter. Four goals, one win, three draws and a successful penalty shootout took them to the semi-finals, where they faced the old foe from across the 49th parallel.

Jessie Fleming's penalty sent the US to a 1-0 defeat, Canada's first victory in the fixture for 20 years. Fleming also scored from the spot in the final with Sweden, another 1-1 draw. The Chelsea midfielder, like so many of the team a youth international under Priestman, kept her nerve again as Canada won the penalty shootout. The colour of the medal was now gold.

"She instilled this belief and bravery that maybe we hadn't had in the past," said Sinclair afterwards of Priestman.

For the quietly determined 35-year-old, the final was as status-altering as for any of her players.

"When I arrived back in Canada people were stopping me in the street and paying for meals," she said. "It feels like my life's changed overnight but it feels really, really good."

GARY NEVILLE

One of the most influential and authoritative voices in English football

On Sunday April 18, The Times reported that six English clubs – Liverpool, Manchester United, Manchester City, Chelsea, Arsenal and Tottenham Hotspur – had agreed to take part in a new European league, alongside three teams each from Italy and Spain. This “Super League”, it was revealed, would eventually involve 20 teams, with the 12 original founders assured of permanent membership.

In the UK, the reaction was immediate, and explosive. Fans of all clubs – both inside and outside the big six – were quick to express their anger, with many heading straight to stadiums to make their feelings known.

Within television, the reaction was similarly vociferous. Speaking from the gantry of Old Trafford, Gary Neville was incandescent: “I’m a Manchester United fan and have been for 40 years of my life, but I’m disgusted, absolutely disgusted,” he said.

“There are 100-odd years of football in this country with fans that have lived and loved these clubs, and they need protecting. The fans need protecting.

“Make no mistake about it, this is the biggest sport in the world, the biggest sport in this country and it’s a criminal act against the fans, simple as that.”

That evening, the European Super League clubs put out a statement confirming their intentions. The following day, Neville appeared on Monday Night Football alongside Jamie Carragher. Their tone had not calmed.

“We have to now mobilise, organise,” said Neville. “Everybody’s got to come behind this. Forget allegiances, forget who you support, we’ve got to come together to stop this proposal.

“We must all come together because this is an attack on the integrity of our national sport and it must be stopped.”

Carragher also called for unity:

Authoritative...
Gary Neville

“I think these clubs think this is a done deal; I don’t think it is. I think supporters up and down this country can stop this.

“Football fans get together, all of us, in TV, pundits, players, managers, get together and stop this because it can be stopped. I’m convinced of it.

“This cannot be allowed to happen.”

By the end of Tuesday, all six Premier League teams had withdrawn their involvement from the proposal.

The interventions of Neville and Carragher did not save the day, but they became the public faces of fans’ opposition. While ex-players can, at times, be accused of being out of touch, the two former defenders used their platform to articulate the popular mood of fans across the country. Neville’s initial reaction was one of the most-watched videos of 2021 on the Sky Sports Football YouTube channel, second only to Cristiano Ronaldo’s Manchester United return.

As a member of the “Our Beautiful Game” group, Neville has already led calls for fundamental reforms in the way that English football is run, including the introduction of an independent regulator.

The ESL proposals caused him to step up his efforts and, if anything is to be achieved in 2022 following the fan-led review (page 10-11), he is sure to be at the heart of it.

VICTOR MONTAGLIANI

Could the CONCACAF president be a future head of FIFA?

The weight of the pandemic-prompted crisis in world football and the headline-busting fuss over a World Cup every two years has overshadowed an intriguing development within the corridors of power: the rise and rise of Victor Montagliani.

The 56-year-old Canadian is the president who has had to rebuild scandal-shattered CONCACAF and has become, along the way, one of the most trusted allies of FIFA president Gianni Infantino.

This is no surprise. Montagliani's family came from Italy, like Infantino. His father was an Internazionale fan, like Infantino. He was an enthusiastic amateur player, like Infantino. Now Montagliani's status as a FIFA vice-president makes him a key member of Infantino's inner circle.

The FIFA Bureau is chaired by Infantino, and comprises the presidents of the six regional confederations. This is where world football's day-to-day power now resides; FIFA Council has been largely reduced to the bureau's rubber stamp.

Montagliani's journey to the top of football's power tables began in 2005 when he became president of the British Columbia Soccer Association. Here he established a reputation as his own man by supporting local Sikh players who had been banned by local officials from wearing a patka (sports option for a turban).

In 2012 he stepped up as president of the Canadian Soccer Association. He chaired the local organising committees for Canada's hosting of the Women's Under-20 World Cup in 2014 and the senior Women's World Cup in 2015. That was when he first proposed a bid for the 2026 Men's World Cup.

He continued to raise his own profile as a member of the FIFA reform commission headed by Swiss lawyer Francois Carrard. A fellow member was Infantino.

During this time, CONCACAF virtually collapsed. Jack Warner had run for cover trophy ahead of the final in October in 2011, before successors Jeff Webb and Alfredo Hawit were claimed by the US Justice Department's FIFA-Gate inquiry.

After seeing off Bermuda's Larry Mussenden 25-16 in the final voting, Montagliani acknowledged that resurrecting and cleaning up CONCACAF would be "a long road," but he wasted no time setting out on that journey.

CONCACAF signed a new marketing partnership with Soccer United Marketing, the commercial arm of MLS, and expanded its club competitions, while Montagliani also kicked off what evolved into the joint-bid by Canada, Mexico and the US to host the 2026 World Cup.

In 2017 Montagliani chaired the football stakeholders commission, which acquired a crucial role in managing the worldwide game's recovery from the COVID-19 pandemic. Then, as football staggered back into action, Montagliani stood dutifully behind Infantino in opposing the Super League.

Not that Montagliani is an Infantino puppet: on the proposals for a World Cup every two years he has sat on the fence. The Canadian said he had an "open mind" and a CONCACAF statement added: "Now is not the time to sow fear" instead his focus has been on leading the technical inspections of the 2026 venue cities.

Onward and upward. Montagliani is a true son of Vancouver with its city motto: By Sea Land and Air We Prosper.

Africa's first female club champions

Mamelodi Sundowns of South Africa win the inaugural CAF Women's Champions League

The celebrations were ecstatic. Dancing, singing, flag-waving, badge-kissing, players and staff jumping into each other's arms and giving thanks to God. Through floods of tears Andisiwe Mgcoyi said: "I'm just so emotional because this is the one we wanted."

The Mamelodi Sundown Ladies striker was talking about the inaugural African Champions League, which the South African team had just won in Cairo, defeating Hasaacas Ladies, of Ghana, 2-0.

Around the world, just as in the men's game, federations are following UEFA in creating a women's Champions League (with the exception of South America, where the Copa Libertadores Feminina began in 2009).

The aim is to provide a platform and inspiration for women's teams, leading to rising standards, interest and investment.

The African competition began with 33 clubs drawn from the 55 federation members, divided into six regionally-based qualifying zones. The West African Zone produced two qualifiers by dint of the Women's AFCON holders, Nigeria, being from the region – appropriately the beneficiary was Nigeria's Rivers Angels.

The seven qualifiers were joined by Egyptian champions Wadi Degla, who hosted the final tournament.

"I'm just so emotional because this is the one we wanted"

Andisiwe Mgcoyi, Mamelodi Sundowns Ladies

They were in Group A alongside Hasaacas, AS Mande (Mali) and Malabo Kings (Equatorial Guinea). Group B featured Sundowns, River Angels, AS FAR (Morocco) and Vifiga Queens (Kenya).

Sundowns reached the final beating Malabo Kings on penalties after a goalless draw. Hasaacas defeated AS FAR 2-1, with the winner coming from Evelyn Badu, the tournament's top scorer and star player.

In the final Mgcoyi set up Chuene Morifi in the 33rd minute, then scored herself in the 65th. Victory completed a ten-match campaign during which they had scored 24 goals and conceded one, winning eight games and losing none. They could justifiably claim to be Africa's best, emulating the success of Sundowns men's team in 2016.

While Africa is up-and-running the Asian equivalent is planned to launch in 2023. In the meantime a small series of regional pilot tournaments are being staged.

The first, in 2019, featured clubs from the leading powers in Asian women's football: South Korea, Japan, China and Australia, all World Cup regulars. Hosted in the South Korean city of Yongin it was won by Tokyo's Verdy Beleza.

The pandemic meant there was no competition in 2020 and also stymied a proposed East Zone event in 2021 between teams from Thailand, Vietnam, Myanmar and Taiwan – no host could be found.

Jordan, however, were happy to stage the West Zone tournament featuring Amman, Buryadkor, Gokulam Kerala and Shahrdari Sirjan, respectively champions of Jordan, Uzbekistan, India and Iran.

This quartet played a six-match round robin from which the hosts emerged triumphant despite losing to bottom-club Buryadkor. This underlined the evenness of a competition in which five matches were won by a single goal.

the men's format, which has separate competitions for the East and West Zones, and a final between the two winners.

The problem, as Bai notes, is "development levels are uneven. Teams in East Asia are relatively strong, while in other regions they still have their work cut out. The biggest job for us is to bridge the gap."

In practice this is likely to mean whoever wins the East Zone would easily win the final, but playing fixtures across the vast, sprawling AFC region could be prohibitively expensive.

CONCACAF plans to launch a continental club tournament in 2023 or 2024. Though this is likely to be dominated in the initial years by American clubs, rapid progress is being made in Mexico and it is hoped that the existence of such a competition will spur development in Olympic champions Canada as well as nations such as Costa Rica and Jamaica.

Further south the 13th edition of the Copa Libertadores Femenina took place in Paraguay in November 2021, with the exception of the final, which was staged in Uruguay.

The big question is whether to copy

The 16-team tournament was won for the third time in five years by Brazil's Corinthians, with a 24-2 goal difference, though 13 of those goals came in two matches against group and semi-final opponents Nacional, of Uruguay.

Colombia's Santa Fe, who had seen off defending champions Ferroviaria in the other semi-final, on penalties, were the beaten finalists. This maintained the competition's historical trend: Brazilian clubs have dominated, between them winning ten titles out of 13.

In Oceania, though the men's Champions League dates back to 1987, there is no immediate sign of a women's version. A spur may be provided should a women's Club World Cup, which has been discussed at FIFA since 2013, actually become a reality.

In the vacuum there have been several private tournaments, though none of a global nature. For better or worse Fifa's involvement may well depend on what happens with the mooted expansion of their men's competition.

► WASHINGTON SHOW SPIRIT AS DAMES IS FIRED

Washington Spirit ended a tough season, for team and league, by winning the NWSL title in Houston with a 2-1 extra-time victory over Chicago Red Stars in the play-off final.

It was Spirit's first title and came at the end of a campaign in which coach Richie Burke was fired following a league investigation into allegations of mistreating players.

That exacerbated a splintering of the ownership group, with players, fans and one owner calling for Spirit owner Steve Baldwin to quit as CEO. Two games were then forfeited due to a COVID outbreak.

The blows galvanised the aptly named Spirit and, under acting coach Kris Ward, they came through the expanded play-off format. Defending champions North Carolina Courage and regular season runners-up OL Reign were beaten en route to the final, with Trinity Rodman (the teenage daughter of former NBA star Dennis Rodman) the break-out star.

Portland Thorns won the regular campaign, a farewell present for Mark Parsons, who has taken charge of the Netherlands. Rhian Wilkinson, who won 181 Canada caps as a player and has been assistant coach to both England and Canada, replaces him.

In a post-script which sadly summed up NWSL's season, within days of its conclusion Red Stars' Rory Dames became the fifth coach to depart under a cloud after the Washington Post published allegations of bullying players during his decade-long reign as manager.

Expansion teams Angel City, of Los Angeles, and San Diego Wave will join NWSL next year. After a chastening summer the league could certainly do with some sunny Californian optimism.

► WSL SACKINGS MOUNT UP

Birmingham City and Leicester City fired Scott Booth and Jonathan Morgan respectively as pressure on managers in England's Women's Super League intensified. Former Birmingham City midfielder Darren Carter was the interim coach for Booth, while England youth coach Lydia Bedford took over at Leicester.

► SOUR END FOR BRAZIL LEGEND

Formiga finally called time on an incredible 26-year international career, spanning seven Olympics and seven World Cups. But there was a sour note as Brazil coach Pia Sundhage left the 43-year-old on the bench until the last 15 minutes of the 6-1 win over India, on the basis that "she is not in the future of the national team". Formiga's mother, who is scared of flying, had flown to Manaus to see her play for Brazil for the first time. The veteran midfielder will continue playing for Sao Paolo.

► WOMEN'S FA CUP FINAL

Chelseas completed a 2020-21 domestic treble when they won the delayed Women's FA Cup final, beating Arsenal 3-0 with an early goal from England's Fran Kirby, followed by a second-half brace from Australia's Sam Kerr. The 51st final, held exactly 10 years after the FA banned women's football, attracted 40,942 supporters inside Wembley, with a 1.5 million UK TV audience.

Cup qualifier

Heroes on the pitch, chaos off the pitch

The Comoros Islands achieved historic success by qualifying for the Africa Cup of Nations finals against a domestic backdrop of controversy, upheaval and infighting

Amir Abdou's success in securing a maiden Africa Cup of Nations finals qualification for the Comoros Islands is all the more remarkable given this was achieved against a background of domestic turmoil.

While Abdou's squad of largely overseas-based players were securing a place at the latest AFCON tournament in Cameroon, football back on the Indian Ocean archipelago of less than 900,000 people was descending into chaos.

Said Ali Salé Athouman had been appointed as president of the Football Federation of the Comoros (FFC) back in February 2018 to help bring stability after his predecessor, Tourqui Salim, quit three months earlier amidst allegations of a match-fixing scandal.

As Abdou's team flourished on the pitch, off the pitch Athouman's reign was punctuated by controversy that ultimately led to the suspension of the FFC just 18 months after he took over.

What allegedly brought Athouman's downfall – according to Josimar magazine – was his decision to nominate his old club instead of domestic league champions Fomboni.

Fomboni reported the president to the FFC's ethics committee, who banned Athouman. Fomboni ultimately earned $20,000 after taking part in the 2019–20 UAFA, but Athouman responded by dissolving the ethics committee.

This crisis led to FIFA sending in a normalisation committee to run the game on the islands. The committee, CoNor, was sent in to revise the FFC's statutes and those for the three leagues played on Grande Comore, Moheli and Anjouan, and the election of a new president.

The committee's mandate was due to expire on September 30, 2020, but work took far longer than expected, in part due to the impact of the COVID-19 pandemic. With transport cancelled between the islands, one member of CoNor, Adfaon Hamada Bacar, was unable to leave Moheli and another member, Fakriddine Youssouf Abdoulhalik, died from COVID.

Only three of the five CoNor members were able to supervise the election, but FIFA dispatched Veron Mosengo-Omba, the chief member associations officer, at the height of the pandemic to oversee the process earlier this year.

Mosengo-Omba has overseen the installation of normalisation committees in other unruly FIFA members, such as Cameroon and Namibia, and the result of the election in the Comoros was no surprise.

CoNor ruled out two other candidates, Said Abdallah Salim, chairman of Rapide Club de Moroni, and Mahmoud Aboud, a former Comoros ambassador to China and to the USA, due to the eligibility of some of their sponsors.

The only remaining candidate was Athouman, who is widely viewed as a supporter of FIFA president Gianni Infantino, and Mosengo-Omba was able to oversee his coronation on January 30, when control was handed back to the FFC. "Our presence brings the normalisation committee to an end, now that it has completed its mission," said Mosengo-Omba.

Athouman's position seems more secure than ever as a few weeks later, Mosengo-Omba left FIFA to take over the role of general secretary at the Confederation of African Football, bringing a key ally for Athouman even closer to the Comoros.

Play-offs beckon for big guns

One of Portugal and Italy, the last two European champions, will miss out on a place in Qatar

Ten down, three to go. Most of Europe's World Cup hopefuls know they will be in Qatar next November. European champions Italy and their Portuguese predecessors are the most notable outliers at risk of embarrassment and elimination in the play-offs next March.

Upset... Serbia pipped Portugal to top of Group A

Managers of the happy ten must now ponder coping with such a lengthy run-up. Usually the finalists need to merely plot their way through a handful of spring friendlies ahead of the finals in June, making only minor changes to their squads. But a year is a long time in terms of national teams.

Didier Deschamps, coach of world champions France, knows this better than most. He and his colleagues must negotiate Nations League ties in the spring then a handful of friendlies squashed between a frantically busy club schedule in the autumn.

Deschamps and Co. will not even have the benefit of a two-week pre-finals training camp. League match injuries risk denying them a host of stars at the last minute.

The October qualifiers had seen Germany and then Denmark become the first Europeans to reach the finals. That left everything else to be decided in November.

Belgium, who remain the world's No.1 team after the latest FIFA rankings, secured Group E victory and their place in Qatar with a comfortable 3-1 win over Estonia. Wales would subsequently take the runners-up spot and enter the play-offs. They will be accompanied by third-placed Czech Republic who benefit from the Nations League "escape hatch" along with Austria who finished fourth behind Denmark and improving Scotland in Group F.

France matched Belgium's success with Kylian Mbappe celebrating his first international hat-trick in 32 minutes in an 8-0 Group D destruction of Kazakhstan. Karim Benzema shrugged off the distractions of his long-running court case to score twice. Mbappe, a key figure in 2018, said: "Even for those of us fortunate enough to have won a World Cup, it's still the ultimate dream to play there."

Spain became the fifth European qualifiers when a lone late goal from Alvaro Morata consigned Sweden to the play-offs. Goalkeeper Robin Olsen had tipped Dani Olmo's shot on to the crossbar and Morata was on hand to tap home the rebound. Luis Enrique's men thus qualified for a 12th consecutive World Cup finals.

That same evening the script took an unexpected twist for Spain's Iberian neighbours Portugal. They only needed a home draw against Serbia, and were on course for Qatar even when Dusan Tadic cancelled out Renato Sanches' opener. However half-time substitute Aleksandar Mitrovic headed a dramatic late winner to send Serbia to the finals and shocked Portugal into the play-offs. Defeat ended Portugal's unbroken

No such pain for Croatia, third in Russia, who overtook the 2018 hosts with a 1-0 Group H victory in Split. Luckless defender Fyodor Kudryashov carried the can after deflecting a Borna Sosa cross into his own net with Russia just nine minutes from the finals.

Some 24 hours later and it was injury-hit Italy's turn to fret after a goalless draw in their World Cup jinx city of Belfast. A notorious defeat there had seen Italy miss the 1958 World Cup finals; this time the 0-0 Group C draw at least offered a play-off slot. Italy's attack let them down. They finished their campaign unbeaten but paid the penalty for four draws since their Euro 2020 triumph. Switzerland capitalised to overtake Italy, thumping Bulgaria 4-0.

Netherlands booked their place with a 2-0 Group G home win over Norway thanks to late goals from Steven Bergwijn and Memphis Depay. Coach Louis van Gaal, who led the Dutch to a third-place finish in Brazil in 2014, had to watch from a wheelchair in the stands after injuring a hip in falling off his bicycle the previous weekend.

Defeat was costly for a Norway team missing injured Erling Haaland, with Turkey taking the play-off spot instead. At least Norway's officials and players will be spared their much-discussed dilemma of whether to boycott Qatar over human rights concerns.

Second round of World Cup qualifying concludes

Ten teams advance to the third round play-offs in March

When the draw for the group phase of the African World Cup qualifiers was made, it was immediately obvious that the heavyweight Group D clash between Cameroon and the Ivory Coast would be the highlight of the campaign, and so it proved the perfect cap to three months of frenetic action.

A boisterous crowd at the new Japoma Stadium in Douala, which will be a focal point of the upcoming Africa Cup of Nations, watched in delight as Lyon's Karl Toko Ekambi slammed home the ball midway through the first half for the game's only goal to ensure top spot in the group for Cameroon.

But it was the goalkeeping of Andre Onana, recently returned from a nine-month drug ban, that proved pivotal for the Indomitable Lions in a massive morale boost before they host the Cup of Nations finals.

Cameroon and Tunisia were the last of the ten group winners to be decided and join the other eight in the March play-offs, where they will be drawn into five knockout ties over two legs with the aggregate winners going on to represent Africa in Qatar.

Morocco and Senegal were the first to win their respective groups, with two games to spare – the Moroccans taking full advantage of their ‘football diplomacy’ of recent years.

The country set out to use the game as a diplomatic lever in the dispute over Western Sahara, large parts of which Morocco annexed when Spain gave up the territory in 1976.

Some acknowledge it is now part of Morocco while other countries recognise the Sahrawi Arab Democratic Republic, which sits in exile and fights a small liberation struggle.

The impasse led to Morocco spending many years outside of the African Union and since their return they have worked tirelessly to try to sway the debate their way.

In football, the Moroccan federation signed multiple co-operation agreements with other, poorer, African countries, offering training camps, coaching assistance and other aid.

So when the Confederation of African Football (CAF), after inspecting stadia across the continent ahead of the World Cup qualifiers, declared many unsuitable and left several countries ‘homeless’ and in need of an alternate venue, Morocco were quick to offer venues as alternate home grounds – at minimal cost to the ‘homeless’ associations.

Agadir, Casablanca, Marrakesh, Rabat and Tangier were all alternate venues in the qualifiers for the likes of Burkina Faso, Djibouti, Liberia, Mozambique and Mali, who won their group.

Somewhat surprisingly, the three teams in Morocco’s own group – Guinea, Guinea-Bissau and Sudan – also agreed to play there, and it was also a surprise FIFA and CAF allowed this to happen.

It meant Morocco played all six of their Group I matches at home and it was therefore no shock they were the only team who finished with a 100 per cent record.

Coach Vahid Halilhodzic has dramatically overhauled what was an already talented team, kicking out Hakim Ziyech (Chelsea) and Noussair Mazraoui (Ajax) for allegedly refusing to play a warm-up friendly in mid-year. The unheralded Ryan Mmae emerged

It was immediately obvious that the heavyweight Group D clash between Cameroon and the Ivory Coast would be the highlight of the campaign as a revelation, having previously played for Belgium at youth level. Senegal, Egypt, Mali and African champions Algeria also ended unbeaten, while Nigeria lost only one game – a shock home defeat to the Central African Republic midway through the campaign, marking their first home loss in a World Cup qualifier since October 1981, when Algeria beat them 2-0 in Lagos.

Nigeria recovered, and only needed a draw in their last game at home to the tiny Cape Verde Islands to win Group C, yet they almost botched that too despite a first-minute goal from Victor Osimhen. It ended 1-1, heaping added pressure on beleaguered German coach Gernot Rohr.

Controversy reigned as both DR Congo and Ghana won at home to Benin and South Africa respectively in their final group games. Both losing teams appealed to FIFA – South Africa for redress over a disputed Ghana penalty (which was ropey to say the least), and Benin over DR Congo’s use of substitutions.

Benin had to avoid defeat in Kinshasa in Group J but were a goal down inside the opening ten minutes after Gabon ref Eric Otogo-Castane awarded a generous penalty to the hosts, a decision that stunned the visitors and bemused the Congolese. DR Congo went on to win 2-0 and come from behind to win Group J.

South Africa also only needed to hold out for a draw but lost to a first-half penalty, converted by captain Andre Ayew, in Ghana. The South African FA compiled an 18-page dossier, which included allegations of “match fixing, match manipulation including corruption and bribery”. FIFA agreed to entertain, before later dismissing, both protests.

Top two easily through

Brazil and Argentina are safely through to the 2022 World Cup, but everybody else is playing catch up in chaotic schedule Eight rounds of South America's World Cup qualifiers were crammed in between September and November, by which time Brazil and Argentina were safely over the line, with a whole year ahead to plan for Qatar.

Brazil's stats – 11 wins and two draws – are impressive, although coach Tite's side have not always shown the fluency of the Russia 2018 qualifiers. There are positive signs, though: the consolidation of Lucas Paqueta and his partnership with Neymar, for example, plus the emergence of Raphinha. Most positive of all is that this is a team that very rarely looks in danger of conceding.

Argentina's defence, so suspect in recent times, is also much improved. Goalkeeper Emiliano Martínez and centre-back Cristian Romero made their debuts as recently as June, but it is already hard to imagine the side without them. In the post-September marathon the team conceded just once – and that was a bizarre VAR penalty.

It was perhaps predictable, then, that the meeting of the giants in Argentina ended goalless. Brazil could probably come away happier from the game – but nobody could come away happy from their aborted meeting in September, when the match was interrupted after five minutes by Brazilian health officials aiming to expel Argentina's Premier League players for breaching COVID protocols. FIFA will have to decide what to do with a game that, happily, will have no bearing on the qualification process. The fixture pile up – and stress with Impressing... Ecuador are on the verge of qualifying for a fourth World Cup in their last six attempts European clubs – was the product of the questionable decision to proceed with the Copa America in the summer instead of using the time to catch up on qualifiers.

The effects of the Copa have been felt, most noticeably in three sides: first, Argentina, whose confidence has been boosted by winning a title; secondly, Ecuador – an interesting work in progress under Gustavo Alfaro. Responsibility is being handed to a promising generation, but in the Copa it was clear that they were too open defensively. A counter-attacking specialist, Alfaro has tightened them up. After the Copa they conceded just three goals and picked up 14 points – only Brazil and Argentina did better. A place in Qatar is theirs for the taking.

And then there is Peru, who appear to be following a similar script to the 2018 campaign, when they got off to a dreadful start, regrouped in the 2016 Copa and found the momentum that carried them all the way to Russia. At the start of September, Peru were bottom of the table. But they built on a good Copa and have subsequently picked up 13 points, carrying them to fifth place, the play-off position. This is remarkable work from coach Ricardo

Going down 3-0 to Bolivia brought the curtain down on a spell of almost 16 years for Oscar Tabarez

Gareca, because Peruvian football is hardly helping. The only new player to break into the first team since 2018 is Gianluca Lapadula, a 31-year-old Italian-born striker who qualified through his mother. Chile are living a similar story with England-born striker Ben Brereton Diaz, adding much needed youth and thrust to an ageing side struggling mightily to get over the line, but with some difficult matches ahead.

Chile are just behind Peru, who in turn are just behind fourth-placed Colombia, crawling to Qatar one point at a time. In ten rounds under coach Reinaldo Rueda they have only been beaten once – but have won just twice. They have now gone an extraordinary five games without scoring. After a year out, James Rodriguez was recalled in November. Colombia will need him close to full fitness to spark some creativity into the team.

Uruguay would welcome such defensive solidity. After six games unbeaten they came badly unstuck when the fixture list put them against Argentina twice and away to Brazil and Bolivia, at the extreme altitude of La Paz. They lost all four, three of them heavily. Coach Oscar Tabarez wanted so much to end his marathon spell with the next World Cup, the tournament where he could field both his veteran strikers and the promising midfielders. But finding a balance proved very difficult, with the team consistently worse on the pitch than it looks on paper. Paraguay changed their coach – Guillermo Barros Schelotto replacing Eduardo Berizzo – after a heavy 4-0 defeat in La Paz. And going down 3-0 to Bolivia also brought the curtain down on a spell of almost 16 years for Tabarez, during which Uruguay had returned to football's top table. But, with easier games to come in the run in, Uruguay's hopes of making it to Qatar are still intact.

Those victories also leave Bolivia close to the qualification positions, but they must start to pick up some away points. Their trip to bottom-of-the-table Venezuela in January is vital. Seldom has a game between these teams had such relevance to the qualification campaign.

Al Hilal make Asian Champions League history

Saudi Arabian side beat Pohang Steelers to clinch their fourth title

History was always going to be made in the AFC Champions League final on November 23 as Al Hilal of Saudi Arabia and South Korea's Pohang Steelers met in Riyadh. These were the only two teams that had won three Asian titles and one of them was going to make it four. As most expected, that team was Al Hilal, who won 2-0 to send 50,000 or so fans at the King Fahd International Stadium not only happy but also free from stress after a comfortable victory.

players in Asia: Malian marksman Moussa Marega, who arrived from Porto in May, joined Bafetimbi Gomis – formerly of France, Lyon, Swansea City and Galatasaray – in attack. When coach Leonardo Jardim, who led Monaco to the 2017 French title, beat a number of European clubs to the signature of Brazilian playmaker Matheus Pereira in August, Hilal moved to the next level.

Yet the headlines belonged elsewhere: to a 22-year-old stand-in left-back. Nasser Al Dawsari was in the team to replace Yasser Al Shahriani, who has been struggling for fitness. After just 16 seconds, he scored the fastest goal ever recorded in the AFC Champions League final – and one of the best. The roars that greeted kick-off were still ringing around the stadium as the youngster picked up the ball just inside the Pohang half. He advanced and then unleashed a thunderbolt of a shot that flew into the top corner past a stunned Lee Jun in the Pohang goal.

Pohang boss Kim Gi-Dong, who had won the 2009 title with the club as a player, said after the game that conceding so early meant that 50 per cent of his game plan had to be scrapped: a solid start and a clean sheet at the break which would frustrate home fans and players. He also said that had Sin Jin-He's dipping half-volley from the edge of the area gone in instead of hitting the bar then it would have been an interesting game. But bounce back into play it did and it turned out to be the closest that the Koreans were going to come.

The final soon settled down but Al Hilal were always on top and extended their lead just after the hour. Gomis slipped a perfect ball through to Marega in the area and the striker slotted home. Pohang were never coming back from tournament actually meet on the pitch.

Al Hilal have helped redress the continental imbalance. Since 2005, eastern clubs have won 13 championships, with the west coming back in 2011 with Al Sadd of Qatar and Hilal eight years later.

There is no reason why Al Hilal can't go on and become the first back-to-back winners since Saudi rival Al Ittihad won the 2004 and 2005 titles. Had the team not been forced to withdraw from the 2020 tournament after an outbreak of COVID-19 then this win could have been that and it was all a bit of an anti-climax from their point of view.

In truth however, with stars such as Song Min-Kyu sold to Jeonbuk Motors in the summer and Lee Seung-Mo unable to leave the country due to unfinished military service commitments, Pohang had done well just to get to the final, which is the first time that teams from the eastern and western zones of the third in a row. With a host of Saudi Arabian internationals – winger Salem Al Dawsari was deservedly named the tournament MVP; while captain Salman Al Faraj is one of the most cultured players on the continent – few would argue that the club are currently number one and deserved that final win.

It ended a great year for football in the country. Under coach Hervé Renard, Saudi Arabia are the most improved national team in Asia and despite being placed in a tough group in the final round of qualification, have collected 16 points from the first six games. At the moment, the Green Falcons sit four points clear of Japan in second and five above Australia in third. As the top two teams go through to the World Cup automatically, the Saudis, with four games remaining, are in a great position to make a sixth appearance on the global stage. Looking forward to 2022, few would bet against Saudi Arabia making it number six and Al Hilal lifting Asian title number five.

Copa Sudamericana

TIM VICKERY

Athletico Paranaense win Copa again

Second Copa Sudamericana in three years for the Curitiba-based club

Experience won the day as Athletico Paranaense beat fellow Brazilians Red Bull Bragantino 1-0 in Uruguay to claim the Copa Sudamericana, the continent's Europa League equivalent.

Bragantino, from upstate São Paulo, have come a long way since the tie-in with the global energy drinks company in 2019. They won promotion to Brazil's first division where, in their second season, they have been performing far better than Athletico. Their focus on solid and rational management is shown by the fact that young Mauricio Barbieri is the longest-serving coach in the league. Unusually in Brazil, his team fields quick centre-backs in a high defensive line and seek to take the game to the opposition.

From the southern city of Curitiba, Athletico Paranaense are not part of Brazil's traditional elite. But, a well-run club, they have been emerging as a force over the last 25 years. They won this competition in 2018, and added the domestic cup the following year (they also reached this year's final).

The current side, then, have acquired considerable knockout knowhow – and this proved decisive in the late spring sunshine of Montevideo's Centenario stadium.

In a bid to get outside Athletico's 3-4-3 system, Bragantino went with an attacking line-up. Their opponents were unfazed; Alberto Valentim, the club's former right-back, only took over as coach in October, and has shrewdly left untouched the deep defence and counter-attack model. The game plan was all about biding their time and waiting for the moment when space the post. It was a great moment for Terans, a Uruguayan playing on the pitch where he made his name,

Leader... Athletico's veteran centre-back Thiago Heleno and an even better one for Nikao, a club stalwart.

A goal ahead – and an outstanding one – Athletico knew the rest of the script by heart. In the domestic cup they had recently eliminated the all-powerful Flamengo with a counter-attacking masterclass and a 3-0 win in Rio's Maracana stadium. They were confident of being able to hold whatever Bragantino could throw at them. Athletico could now be even happier to defend deep, allowing captain Thiago Heleno, in the middle of the back three, to operate in reduced space, heading and kicking the ball away.

Barbieri abandoned his

4-4-2 at half-time in favour of the more customary 4-3-3, but still the team could not find its rhythm on the big occasion. The more Bragantino strained to get back into the game, the more Athletico interrupted the flow of a stop-start second half. Artur, Bragantino's most potent attacking weapon, was never able to get into the action. There were a couple of minor alarms from corners, but Athletico keeper Santos had a comfortable afternoon, with not a serious save to make before the celebrations could begin.

The problem was that there were so few fans in the Centenario stadium to do the celebrating. The grand old bowl was not even close to being a third full. Athletico had more supporters present than Bragantino, but neither of these clubs have giant followings. The big question here was the validity of staging a one-off final in a neutral venue, happening for the third year.

This 2021 version brought special complications. South America's air connections are inadequate and overpriced during normal times, and the pandemic has made this even worse. With borders only just re-opening, travel is especially precarious. And very unwisely, CONMEBOL only added to the problem with absurd ticket prices. The cheapest seat in the house was $100 – a fortune by South American standards, and well beyond the means of the average fan.

The idea of the final in a neutral venue has pros and cons. There are – or should be – clear marketing advantages from staging a one-off game. But any sense of occasion is fatally undercut by the existence of so many empty spaces in the stands. Some kind of rethink should surely take place before the final of the 2022 Copa Sudamericana.

Frustrated... Bragantino forward Artur

FROM THE EDITOR

World Soccer has been the unrivaled authority on football around the world since 1960. Under Kelsey Media and my stewardship, we have continued to ensure the magazine remains true to the principles that have made it an institution of football journalism for over 60 years.

Every issue has serious, hard-hitting opinions from the game's most respected writers who offer their expert analysis on football's burning issues. Our global correspondents cast the net far and wide to provide in-depth features and stunning imagery, often approaching big stories through the lens of those close to the scene to give you unprecedented access.

We provide face-to-face interviews with the game's biggest names: players, coaches, untapped talents and influential figures behind the scenes.

We shine the spotlight on the talented youngsters tipped for the top, highlighting tomorrow's stars today; something the magazine has always had a rich history and tradition of doing.

And how can we forget the essential previews of the World Cup and European Championship, special issues that have helped build World Soccer's reputation as the "bible" of the global game.

Now, we don't want to change any of this, but what we do want is to gather your thoughts and opinions – on how you think World Soccer is currently doing, and to help shape the brand going forward; in both print and online.

We value your support and opinion, and we want to ensure that we get things right. You can complete this survey online or fill in this form and return it by post.

Thank you for taking the time to be part of shaping World Soccer's future, and we look forward to bearing your thoughts.

Teddy Sheringham

Manchester United 2 Bayern Munich 1

1999 Champions League final, Nou Camp, Barcelona

The 1999 Champions League final was one of the most dramatic of all time – and Teddy Sheringham was right at the heart of it. After coming off the bench, he scored one goal and assisted another as Manchester United sealed an historic treble...

“ We knew there wasn't a lot between Bayern and us. We had drawn with them twice and they had already won the league and cup in Germany, so we were playing for the treble as well.

We had our most influential player missing in Roy Keane. We had so many fantastic players, but without Keane we weren't the same. He was our leader and driving force, as he showed against Juventus in the semi-final. We knew we had to be on top of our game for the final.

Bayern started fantastically. They went 1-0 up and could have gone two, three or even four up; they hit the bar, the post, and Peter Schmeichel made some great saves. But when the game stays at 1-0, you always have a chance.

It was a strange dressing room at half-time – there wasn't much said. We had dominant players, but they weren't vocal: Jaap Stam and Ronny Johnsen were big and dominant at centre-half but not vocal; Denis Irwin was ever-present but quiet; David Beckham and Ryan Giggs weren't vocal; Gary Neville always had something to say but he wasn't dominant then because he had senior players above him.

But there was an inner belief. You looked around and thought: "I know he's going to fight until the bitter end to make sure we've got a chance of winning this game."

At half-time, Sir Alex came to me and said: "If we're still losing 1-0 after 15 minutes, you're going on." So I sat there thinking: "Please don't score."

I wanted to be part of the game. I didn't want my team to win without me doing anything – I won't deny that. Then in the final ten minutes we came alive.

When Becks took that first corner, it was getting desperate because Schmeichel had come up. Becks played the ball to the far post. Dwight Yorke tried to help the ball back in. Stefan Effenberg tried to clear it and it went to the edge of the box. I saw it fall to Giggsy on his right foot and I'm thinking: "This could go anywhere!"

He scuffed his volley and it came bobbling towards me. I tried to hit it as hard as I can and scuttled it off my ankle past the goalkeeper, and into the goal.

I knew I was onside but as I turned away to celebrate I had to look over my shoulder to make sure the linesman hadn't put his flag up. I saw him with his hands down and went off to celebrate in front of the fans – they were going absolutely nuts. It was like: "Right, this is going to extra-time."

Twenty seconds later, we had another corner. The crowd are going nuts now because they know we're in the final seconds and we've got another chance.

Becks goes across to take it, and now I'm feeling ten feet tall. I'm thinking: "Put that ball wherever you want – I'm going to head it, I'm going to score."

As he put the ball in I got across my man and rose up to head it in the near post, but instinctively I knew I was up a bit too early. People that understand football will know in that split second you change your mind. I realised that if I head it for goal, it's going to go over the bar, so all I can do is head it into an area at the far post and hope one of my mates is there.

As I flicked it to the far post, I could just see Ole putting it into the roof of the net.

Everyone just exploded. The Bayern end went completely dead; their players were lying on the floor – they just couldn't believe what had happened.

How do you explain it? It's like Roy of the Rovers stuff – these things don't happen.

It must have been two minutes of celebrations before we walked back; 20 seconds later the final whistle went.

Sir Alex said to me: "If we're still losing 1-0 after 15 minutes, you're going on." So I sat there thinking: "Please don't score"

It was pure ecstasy. Some people ask: "Is scoring a goal better than sex?" I think that right it was.
